Israel, U.S. sign anti-missile pact

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres and U.S. Secretary of Defence William Perry signed an agreement on Sunday providing Israel with immediate assistance for defence against Katyushas and extensive cooperation in long-term laser missile defence.

The United States will provide Israel with intelligence "in a matter of seconds on a ballistic missile launch," Perry said.

The two agreed to jointly develop a prototype of the Nautilus anti-missile laser system defence that will be available for testing in Israel by late 1997, Perry told reporters at a Pentagon news conference following their two-hour meeting.

The United States will send a delegation of specialists to Israel next week to investigate interim means of defending the Galilee against Katyushas, and to explore additional areas of security cooperation, Perry said.

The working group will be led by Undersecretary of Defence for Policy Walter Slocum and Defence Ministry Director-General David Ivry, Pentagon spokesperson Kenneth Bacon said.

In outlining the contents of the agreement, Peres said, "The important thing is the interim anti-Katyusha weapons [system]."

Perry said the two also discussed further cooperation in anti-terrorism efforts.

Within the next 3½ weeks, the working group will have decided precisely how Israel's satellite access will work, Ivry told Israeli reporters Sunday night.

Among the temporary options being considered is the Phalanx, a system currently used on American warships to shoot down incoming missiles, Bacon said. The system is shorter-range than the Nautilus and "is not the perfect weapon for these problems," he said.

CJC looks to the future

Budget cuts loom

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) national executive committee last week approved a draft 1996-97 budget of almost $3.5 million dollars in national and regional allocations, despite a suggestion by its chief funder, CJF Canada, that five to 10 percent of the budget may be slashed.

Last year, CJC spent just over $3 million.

CJC treasurer Zave Climan said he was informed of the promised cuts just a week earlier.

The move, he said, has forced CJC's budgeting committee to "go back to the drawing board," even though the 1996-97 budget is supposed to come into effect in July.

Richard Vineberg, president of CJF Canada, confirmed that allocations would likely be reduced to CJC and to other national Jewish organizations funded by CJF Canada, such as Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and Network.

Election process revised

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — All delegates to future Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Plenary Assemblies should be accredited and registered long before the opening, if the "snafu" that marred the last plenary is to be avoided, according to the report of the ad hoc bylaw review committee headed by Judge Herbert Marx.

"It is essential that appropriate and workable deadlines be established for the accreditation and registration of delegates," it says.

In addition, nominations for elected national officers, including president, should be submitted 90 days in advance of the plenary, the committee says.

The report, described as being adopted unanimously by the committee's seven members, was submitted to the CJC national officers and released to The CJN.

The report does not find fault; rather it blames "the absence of sufficiently comprehensive electoral rules and regulations."

Letter bomb in Calgary

CALGARY — A local woman received superficial injuries after opening what turned out to be a letter bomb at the Calgary Jewish Centre Monday morning.

According to local reports, the bomb, which was addressed to the Jewish National Fund, only partially exploded. Police were called in at 10 a.m. to begin their investigation. No threats or warnings had been received in the past few days.

The News In Brief

International

CANADA

Canada to Aid Lebanon

OTTAWA – The minister for international cooperation and minister responsible for la Fracophonie, Pierre Pettigrew, announced that the Canadian International Development Agency will provide humanitarian aid to displaced people in Lebanon following the recent events including the shelling of a refugee camp on a UN base.

White Supremacist in B.C.

EDMONTON – A white supremacist who attacked and blinded a former broadcaster is back in jail after more than five years on the run. Daniel Sims, 25, was arrested at the Creston, B.C. border crossing on April 11. He will serve his sentence in Peace River, Alta.

PLO Amendment

MONTREAL – Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon welcomed news that the Palestine National Council has removed several sections from its covenant that called for Israel's destruction.

"We hope this new initiative will set the tone for the next round of negotiations which will hasten the arrival of a comprehensive peace between Israel and all her Arab neighbors.

ISRAEL

Airspace Use Denied

JERUSALEM – Cyprus has refused to grant Israeli pilots permission to train in its airspace because a military airbase is being built near the airport Israel wanted to use.

The refusal comes against the background of an agreement between Israel and Turkey allowing Israeli pilots to use Turkish airspace to fly training missions.

Hamas Plot Foiled

JERUSALEM – As Palestinian security police continued to pursue a Hamas activist who allegedly plotted to kill Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, Jordan denied that it was harboring the fugitive.

Jordanian Information Minister Marwan Muashar said in Amman that the accused man, identified as Ziad Qishawi, was not in Jordan and that the state registrar had no record of him.

WORLD

British Decision Welcome

LOS ANGELES – The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has applauded the decision of the British authorities to prosecute suspected Nazi war criminal Sernion Serafimowicz who was accused of involvement in the murder of Jews in Belarus during World War II and has resided in England for more than four decades.

Neo-Nazis, Police Clash

BONN – In what has become an annual tradition, several neo-Nazi groups in Germany clashed with police last week as they celebrated Adolf Hitler's birthday.

Neo-Nazis marched in two small towns in the central German state of Thuringia, where they shouted "Heil Hitler" and "Sieg heil."

Arab Americans Protest

WASHINGTON – Amid chants of "Israel out of Lebanon" and "We vote, too," more than 1,000 Arab Americans gathered at the White House to protest Israel's continuing raids in Lebanon.

Protesters unfurled banners across the street from the White House. The signs spanned the gamut of Arab American opinion on the Israeli operation.

Terrorism in Germany

BONN – Germany's two main intelligence agencies have issued warnings of possible attacks by Hezbollah militants operating in the country.

German authorities believe that Iranian and Hezbollah activists are planning a bombing campaign against Israeli, American and possibly German targets.

As a result of recent threats by Hezbollah, security was beefed up at the Israeli Embassy in Bonn.

Auschwitz Project Ends

NEW YORK – The controversy over a partially constructed mini-mall across from the former Auschwitz death camp in Poland appears to have come to an end.

The shopping complex investor last week decided to drop the project and the Polish foreign minister said the existing structure would be demolished.

Nazi Crimes

ROME – Former SS Capt. Erich Priebke goes before a Rome military court May 8 to face charges of involvement in Italy's worst Nazi atrocity, the massacre of 335 civilian men and boys in the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome.

Shapiros To Be Honored

NEW YORK – Montreal natives Dr. Bernard J. Shapiro and Dr. Harold T. Shapiro, twin brothers who are, respectively, principal and vice-chancellor of McGill University and president of Princeton University, will receive honorary degrees from Yeshiva University at its 65th annual commencement exercises on May 22.

Extradition Sought

WASHINGTON – Members of Congress are calling on both Yasser Arafat and Israeli authorities to arrest and extradite to the United States the mastermind of the 1985 Achille Lauro hijacking.

Mohammed Abbas, known as Abul Abbas, was in Gaza last week as the Palestine National Council voted to amend its charter.

North York Salutes Outstanding Volunteers

NORTH YORK – North York city council recently paid tribute to 14 of its best volunteers during National Volunteer Week at a special presentation.

Among the winners was: 17-year-old Naomi Davids, teen council president at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; Charles Goeldner, who for the past 10 years has spent a few days each week at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living; Gillian Katz, who has volunteered at C.H. Best Elementary and Middle School for the past seven years and Monty Selesnick, who gave many years of service to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Rabin's granddaughter a 'symbol' of hope

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Since the day six months ago when Noa Ben Artzi-Pelossof shared personal memories of Yitzhak Rabin in a heart-rending eulogy broadcast worldwide, the teenage granddaughter of Israel's slain prime minister has become somewhat of a symbol herself.

"Yes, I'm typical of young Israelis, but I'm also different," she mused in a recent interview at the offices of Knopf Canada, publisher of the Canadian edition of In the Name of Sorrow and Hope, her 181-page tribute to her grandfather and her country.

Here as part of a month-long book tour, Ben Artzi-Pelossof, 19, said her decision to write the book met with criticism from Israelis who accused her of "commercializing the assassination."

Ben Artzi-Pelossof chose not to defend her book, however, until after it was written. "I think it's very dishonest, in a way, to defend something which does not exist."

The anticipated censure gave her pause initially, but not writing the book would have shown cowardice, she said. "I knew that it was the right thing to do ... and my family supported me."

Despite her youth, she has a measure of credibility as an author. A published poet, she works at the military newspaper as part of her mandatory 17-month stint in the Israeli army.

"It was kind of a private journey," she recalled of the two months she spent writing the book in the early morning hours. "My grandfather was a symbol — politician, peacemaker, soldier, tough guy — but he wasn't. He was very human, very warm, very loving; and this side of him people never knew."

In a talk the previous night to 800 people at Holy Blossom Temple, Ben Artzi-Pelossof said she wanted young people, especially Israelis, to know of her grandfather's honesty and principles.

She thinks that young Israelis have become cynical, she told The CJN. She herself does not have a jaundiced eye, she explained, because of her lifelong proximity to politics. World leaders "came across very human" to her.

Noa Ben Artzi-Pelossof

Her voice is tinged with cynicism, however, when she recalls that it was on the most horrible day of her life that the world became enamored of her. "The wheel can turn," she said. "[Today] you are on top, but tomorrow you can be down."

But because she had eulogized Rabin the grandfather not Rabin the politician, she struck a universal chord that is likely to resonate for a long time.

Hundreds of people have opened up to her in personal letters about their own bereavements and tearful reactions to Rabin's death.

She has answered less than a third of them. "It's very difficult to sit and write emotional letters to several hundred people, and to send a typed card is not the right answer for this kind of letter."

In a previous interview on ABC's Prime Time Live, host Diane Sawyer referred to the "trademark toughness of Rabin and his women."

When asked how accurate Sawyer's assessment was, Ben Artzi-Pelossof was uncharacteristically hesitant. "I don't know," she said, her face transformed by the shy half-smile she'd described as her grandfather's. With sunglasses perched atop her head and one stylishly blue-jeaned leg crossed over the other, she managed to project both teenage trendiness and self-assurance.

Only time will tell if she is strong, a word she prefers to tough, she said.

"My grandfather was so strong. I wish to be like him, [in] strength, courage, honesty, and above all brains.

"We owe it to ourselves to complete the peace process, but beyond that we owe it to him," she stresses.

When her optimism falters, she remembers her grandfather telling her, "Noale, nothing's impossible. Failure is just another reason to keep trying."

Congress, Reform party find common ground

By MIRIAM VALE
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA – Officials of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) say they agree with the Reform party on several issues after a wide-ranging meeting last week with leader Preston Manning and Reform MPs.

"There is a great deal of common ground," said Hal Joffe, national chair of community relations for CJC. For example, he said both sides support the Middle East peace process.

But there remain several differences in approaches. Although both CJC and the Reform party's immigration policies welcome refugees, Joffe says Reform's policy is "less-inclusive."

Joffe said the important task is working together towards a common policy on immigration.

According to Manning, the meeting was "a good chance to update what we're saying versus what they're saying."

He said these exchanges help the party develop its platform to include all Canadians.

Initiated by CJC, this meeting was the first since the 1992 federal election. CJC executives briefed Manning and party critics about issues before the Jewish community.

One of those is hate crime legislation. Last June, Justice Minister Allan Rock introduced Bill C-41, which would impose harsher penalties for those convicted of hate crimes. CJC supports the bill but the Reform party voted against it, mainly because of its gay-rights provisions.

Manning said disagreeing with the bill does not make the party racist or anti-Semitic. He said the party disagreed with the Liberals' method for implementing the bill, not the idea of more severe penalties for convicted hatemongers.

'Dispel fears'

"There were charges, fears and concerns that Reform might be anti-Semitic, extreme or racist," Manning said. "We want to do everything we can to dispel those fears and to get down to discussing the real issues that concern communities."

CJC national president Goldie Hershon said another key issue is Canadian unity. She spoke about the importance of a unified country because Jews in Montreal voted overwhelmingly (97.3 percent) against Quebec's separation in the October referendum.

Hershon said the Reform MPs supported her calls for a unified Canada.

Another issue raised was the deportation of suspected Nazi war criminals. Jack Silverstone, CJC's national executive director, spoke about his frustration with the delays in prosecuting accused Nazi war criminals.

"We desire to see these cases move forward at a greater speed," he said, adding that Reform agreed with CJC's understanding of the issue.

Joffe said the meeting did not represent an alliance with the Reform party. He said CJC regularly meets with other political parties.

"[Understanding these differences] is part of our process of becoming aware where they stand on issues and making them aware where we stand on issues," Joffe said.

Manning agreed. "It's part of a relation-building."

He said it's important to meet with CJC and speak to the Jewish community to find out how the Reform party can understand Jewish concerns.

Manning said the dialogue will continue. No dates for a future meeting have been set.

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which replace chemically broken bonds in damaged hair.

The less damage the better. Less Alkaline. The PH level is important. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about PH 5. Regular perms and hair colouring are a minimum PH and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the PH. levels of my perms and colours to lower than PH. 5 and minimize from a treatment for the hair. This is the revolution.

Readers write

Readers constantly write to The CJN. I am very grateful that they do. For reader involvement – letters, suggestions, ideas, criticism, advice, opinions and submissions – is one of the key ingredients in maintaining the vitality and strength of the newspaper. It is a form of consumer feedback. It is also proof of the paper's relevance. We wholeheartedly welcome this involvement and we invite our readers to send their submissions to the paper.

Unfortunately, we have space in the paper to publish only a fraction of the material we receive from our readers. It is inevitable, therefore, that many of the readers who have taken the time and sometimes even the courage, to collect their thoughts and commit them to paper, will be disappointed not to see them in print. We do our best and will always do our best to try to minimize that disappointment. But, given our format as a weekly newspaper, we will always have more material than space available to publish it.

Thus, it seemed worthwhile to explain to readers some of the factors involved in the decisions surrounding the publishing of submissions.

Submissions from readers fall into a number of categories. The most conventional of course, is the letter to the editor. The "rules" for publishing letters to the editor appear on the editorial and letters page. We try to reflect as wide and as timely a discussion among our readers as possible on that page. It is important to remind readers, though, that the opinions of the letter writers are not the opinions of The CJN. Indeed, that is precisely why space is reserved for letters to the editor: to provide a kind of bulletin board for opinions which may be contrary to or supportive of those expressed by the paper, in the paper or even outside the paper as a response to current events. Letters wait in a queue and will generally appear in print on the basis of first-come-first-served.

Occasionally readers send small "essays" of approximately 1,500 words in length on subjects related to the paper's broad mandate. If suitable for publication, these submissions might find their way onto the Perspectives page.

Shorter submissions of approximately 500 words – commentary, analysis or even narrative – if suitable for publication, might appear as one of our Guest Voices in the pages of Jewish Life. To be suitable for publication, submissions must be well written. And, in the opinion of the editor, they must convey a new, interesting or important point of view.

Thankfully, we also receive "creative" works such as reminiscences and poetry. To be suitable for publication, this material must be well written and must also bear a message or a meaning which is universal and not simply personal to the writer. I save these submissions and as space permits, I try to publish them.

Therefore I urge readers to send submissions to The CJN. If you do not mind "risking" the frustration of not necessarily seeing your work published, we are happy and eager to receive it. To those readers who may have already sent submissions which have not been printed, please be patient and accepting of our final editorial judgment. We will always do our best to publish what we can.

Ruth Adams of North York, Ont., sent me the following letter, in which she recounted a memorable Passover experience. She even gave it a title: Out of the Mouths of Babes.

Adams wrote: I would like to share a delightful Pesach story with you. My 5-year-old granddaughter Arielle called me during Pesach and said, "Bubby, I have the chicken pox."

I replied, "I'm sorry."

And then she said, "It's all right. Mommy is going to give me a bath in oatmeal to help the itchiness go away."

Then to my surprise she added, "But Bubby, oatmeal is chametz. So mommy is going to give me a bath in matzah meal."

Miriam Schneid-Ofseyer, also of North York, sent the following poem called Between the Bricks.

Between the bricks
On the second floor of the neighbor's house,
Under their window,
A seed, one of the thousands,
Shed by the birch tree
On the front lawn
Put its roots,
Grew some birch leaves,
Pretending to be Like its parent below,
A little birch.
No water, no earth
Still it is there.

Today it started
To shed some yellow leaves.
Faithful to nature's laws,
Faithful to its own duties.
Not a tear. Not a scream.

Oh, my Poor little birch
In the bricks.

Kosher food bank keeps busy

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —When hungry people started coming into the Pride of Israel Synagogue on Bathurst Street, Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich was not content to send them to other institutions, or even to just give them kosher food certificates.

The 29-year-old rabbi and his congregation founded a food bank, the only full-time kosher food bank in Canada, he believes.

Users of the food bank, who range, he said, from Lubavitchers to recent immigrants from Russia, receive food packages which include frozen chickens, courtesy of shul chazzan Chuck Weinberg, owner of Chai Poultry; as well as pasta, rice, peanut butter and jelly, vegetables and grape juice. Special packages are prepared for Pesach and Rosh Hashanah.

There has been a tremendous increase in demand, Rabbi Flanzraich said, an increase which he feels will continue due to government social service cutbacks.

"I'm not debating the ethical aspect of the cutbacks — I'm just saying that more people will need this service."

Rabbi Flanzraich said that he hopes the community will become more involved in the project, including financially.

"Whoever is hungry should know that they don't have to go to the Salvation Army for help," he said.

The synagogue's interest in the food bank is a natural outgrowth of its history, as the offshoot of the well-known Pride of Israel Mutual Benefit Society.

"The society was a place where you could get free medical care, sick benefits, and help if you were widowed or orphaned," the rabbi said.

"The very roots of our shul are in chesed, and we are very proud of those roots."

Rabbi Flanzraich said that he is also working on a "workfare" program for teenagers, where he will try to arrange, for this year or the next, summer jobs for them. "Even if those jobs don't lead to something permanent, at least it will get them off the streets for the summer."

Rabbi Flanzraich, who has been at the synagogue for two years, has a definite vision for Pride of Israel.

"It is a pathway to tradition. It is an open door for people who want tradition, but don't have a childhood exposure to it. We want to educate and acclimatize them to the strength and beauty of Judaism."

"Rabbi Aaron," as he is affectionately called in the congregation, said that the synagogue offers weekly adult education classes, an active Hebrew School (which has grown since he came from "zero" to 103 strong), a junior Shabbat congregation, and boasts two morning minyanim and a well-attended Mincha/Ma'ariv service.

"We have a tremendous core of highly charged, dedicated singles and young couples who don't feel comfortable elsewhere.

'They want a shul and clergy that are reflectives of their values — or their desired values."

Canada's Holocaust stamp remains largely unsold

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada Post Corp. has sold just one-third of its much-praised Holocaust stamps.

In order to boost sales, Canada will team up with Israel to sell Holocaust-themed stamps from both countries, at a huge stamp show in Toronto next month.

The last day of public sale for Canada's 45-cent issue is May 8, six months after it was unveiled on the 57th anniversary of Kristallnacht and the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

Canada Post printed 15 million of the stamps and sold roughly five million, spokesperson Tim McGurrin told The CJN last week.

But the corporation is not disappointed with the sales figures, McGurrin added.

He explained that the post office issued three commemorative stamps within a very short time last fall: one paying tribute to La Francophonie, another to the United Nations and one to the Holocaust and its victims.

Given that crowded field, sales of the Holocaust stamp were "quite good, considering the circumstances," he said.

McGurrin added that Canada Post will not lose money on the issue because sales to about one million collectors were strong.

The stamps were sold to collectors in cornerblocks of four each, and panes of 20 each.

McGurrin played down the fact that 10 million of the stamps remain unsold. "We'd much rather have a lot left over than fail to meet demand."

He said it's too soon to tell whether the stamps would be destroyed.

But it's possible that collectors or dealers with business proposals will still be able to buy the stamps after May 8, he said.

Last year, Israel also issued a stamp commemorating the Holocaust. Canada Post is working with its Israeli counterpart to put out a "showcard," a limited two-stamp cover issue of the Holocaust-related denominations from both nations, McGurrin said. If they are successful, the issue will be sold at CAPEX, the Canadian Philatelic Exhibition, to take place at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre June 8 to 16.

Former JCC Valley branch opens under private ownership

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The former Valley branch of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has come under private ownership and is scheduled to open its doors for tennis on May 1 as the Valleywood Club.

Efforts of a members group to run the club as a community centre independent of the old JCC failed when fundraising efforts did not attract the sums necessary to pay off the club's $1-million bank debt, said Allan Wexler, former chair of the Valley Tennis and Swim Club, the members-created successor to the Valley branch.

Instead, the club was sold to the Sports Clubs of Canada (SCC), which has pumped approximately $2.5 million into the property to acquire it, pay off the bank debt and renovate it, said Michael Levy, president of the SCC.

While the club will open for tennis on 14 outdoor courts on May 1, final renovations are expected to take another month or more. At that time, the club will officially open all its new facilities.

Despite the transfer of the community centre to private hands, Levy said the club will endeavor to maintain the family atmosphere and social focus that characterized the Valley branch and later the Valley Tennis and Swim Club.

About 550 members joined the club even before it opened its doors. That's about 100 more than last year and the long-term goal is to attract 1,500 members, Levy said.

That optimistic projection is a far cry from the numbers attending the Valley Tennis and Swim Club in recent years. When a group of members took over the centre about a year ago, it was a branch of the JCC. As part of the price of becoming independent, the members group agreed the new club would assume $1 million of the JCC's estimated $15-million debt.

They hoped Valley members would support a $1-million capital campaign and while membership was stable at about 450, the club could not generate enough funds to pay the crippling interest charges on the debt, Wexler said.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (which had forwarded substantial sums to bail out the Bathurst and Bloor branches of the JCC) declined to help save the Valley club, Wexler said.

"From the beginning, the Valley was not seen by the federation as having a Jewish value," he said.

Most federation members saw it as simply a tennis club with little Jewish content.

"I think the federation to this day doesn't understand the value of getting Jewish kids together [for tennis]," Wexler added.

However Morris Zbar, a spokesperson for the federation, disagreed. "While the federation appreciated the value of the Valley, we were in a situation where our social services were being suffocated by the government and we had to deal with a specific crisis of a 21 percent cut in welfare," he said.

"We needed to lessen the impact on the 500 families which received supplementary assistance," and the federation was pressed to come up with a $400,000 shortfall due to government cuts, he added.

In that context, supporting the Valley was not a high priority item, Zbar added.

When talks with the federation ended, they resumed with the SCC (they'd been on-again, off-again for years as the JCC teetered on the verge of bankruptcy) and the deal was closed in January.

In late February, the interior of the facility was gutted and renovations began.

TORONTO — The ramifications of breast cancer go beyond the physical. Breast cancer survivors and those undergoing treatment must also deal with the emotional effects of losing a breast, losing their hair and losing their sense of self-worth.

When a woman feels better about the way she looks, her self-esteem increases and in some cases, so does her physical well-being.

On May 8, from 7:30 to 9:30 p.m., Shoppers Home Health Care will hold its second annual Mastectomy Fashion Show and Information Expo at the Ramada Hotel ballroom, 185 Yorkland Blvd.

Marvelle Koffler will speak about the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Lawyer seeks stay in war crimes cases

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The lawyer representing alleged Nazi war criminal Johann Dueck is planning to ask for a stay of proceedings because of recent out of court discussions aimed at speeding up the case.

Ottawa barrister Donald Bayne states in an April 23 letter to the administrator of the Federal Court: "It is my view that the new issue is of such superordinate importance and its nature is such that it will be impossible for the court to take any further steps in this case until it resolves this issue.

"It is fundamental that not only litigants but the entire Canadian public be assured there is no improper, behind-the-scenes interference in ongoing litigation and that the independence of the judiciary and the impartiality of the court is unquestioned."

The new issues, he goes on to say, are "integral to both the reality and perception of impartiality of this honorable court."

Bayne's letter came after Ted Thompson, the assistant deputy minister of justice, wrote to Chief Justice Julius Isaac saying that unless the Federal Court dealt with war crimes cases expeditiously, the issues would be referred directly to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Isaac then met with Associate Chief Justice James Jerome, who is presiding over the Dueck, Erichs Tobiass and Helmut Oberlander cases. Later, Isaac wrote to Thompson saying Jerome did not appreciate the urgency of dealing with the cases quickly. (In one case, a key witness had died and another was in the hospital.)

Court was to hear preliminary discussions on procedural matters involving the three cases on Tuesday, after The CJN went to press.

On Monday, Crown prosecutor Christopher Amerasinghe said he had not yet received any documentation from Bayne on the stay issue. Court is scheduled to reconvene on May 15 and 16 to discuss other legal issues.

Thompson told The CJN he'd been assured by Isaac that the Federal Court can deal with the cases expeditiously. Federal authorities are hoping to launch further cases within one year, he added.

In all, Justice Department lawyers have prepared 12 cases of alleged Nazi war criminals and forwarded them to the Immigration Department for prosecution.

While Bayne was highly critical of the attempt to speed up the pace of prosecutions, Irving Abella, former president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the goverment is finally manifesting the sense of urgency felt by the Jewish community for the past 20 years.

These words have helped millions of people.

'We must treasure that treasure' of the Jewish state

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the sombre lighting of a memorial candle to a rousing "Yom Ha'atzmaut Samayach!" Toronto's religious Zionist community marked the transition from Yom Hazikaron, the memorial day for those killed in Israel's wars, to Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day.

A standing room only crowd packed Thornhill's Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation sanctuary for the event, which was sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada, Emunah Women and Bnei Akiva.

In one month, Israel Consul General Jehudi Kinar said, "Israelis — and they alone — will go to the polls and decide what road they want to take to peace. Not if they want peace, but how to achieve it."

Israel, he said, should be reaping the benefits of peace, not mourning more and more victims of Arab terror, victims who, he added, are memorialized in the same way as soldiers killed in battle.

Kinar spoke of Israel's healthy and growing economy and its healthy immigration rate.

"Canadians must maintain their spiritual attachment to Israel, Kinar said. "If Israel is not central to your lives, then assimilation will increase in your community. Israel is the only place we can live as a majority, not just as a tolerated minority."

A memorial candle was lit to the memory of the over 18,000 men and women killed in Israel's wars. After a moment of silence, Shlomo Sufrin intoned the K'El Maleh Rachamim, the traditional memorial prayer, and Zvi Stanislavsky, representing the Torah Department of the World Zionist Organization, recited the official memorial prayer of the Israeli rabbinate.

Daniel Domb, principal cellist of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, accompanied readings by young men and women of Bnei Akiva schools and a choir composed of young men from Or Chaim and Bnei Akiva.

The haunting theme from Schindler's List was a mournful backdrop to several readings: The story of Uriel, who planned a big party to introduce the story writer to a "really great girl," but wound up instead "wrapped in a blanket at the first-aid station." And Yochai's Daddy, who wouldn't be coming home again. "Now I am my daddy," says Yochai. And the heart-rending poem, where dead young soldiers tell Israel: "We are the silver platter on which you were given the Jewish state."

Rabbi Baruch Taub, reading partly from a sermon found in the ruins of the Warsaw Ghetto, said that out of the ashes of the Holocaust, Jews had been given a remarkable treasure, "and we must treasure that treasure."

In Kiryat Shmona, he said, the official marking of Yom Hazikaron has been called off because of Hezbollah attacks. "Our treasure needs us and our children, perhaps more than ever."

The choir, accompanied by members of the Zemer Orchestra, concluded the program with rousing musical selections that had the audience clapping, swaying and singing along.

Rabbi Aharon Engelman, a teacher at Or Chaim, led the special Yom Ha'atzmaut Ma'ariv service.

The evening concluded with dancing and refreshments.

Radio personalities slammed for remarks

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Broadcast Standards Council (CBSC) has rebuked two Toronto radio commentators for on-air remarks they made in September 1995 that were abusive and discriminatory towards Jews.

The original remarks by CHUM personality Brian Henderson, later supported by CFTR commentator Dick Smyth, "were incorrect and inappropriate, a textbook case of what Canada's private broadcasters sought to avoid when they created their own Code of Ethics," the CBSC decision states.

However, the CBSC said apologies broadcast by the commentators and their stations soon after the remarks were made, along with human rights sensitization programs at CHUM, sufficiently redressed the situation.

The incidents that prompted 40 letters of complaint to the CBSC began when Henderson suggested "the root cause of the crisis in the Legal Aid system is Jewish mothers." He went on to say Jewish mothers are "infamous" for pushing their children to become lawyers, doctors or dentists and that Ontario has too many lawyers. He concludes with "a Jewish proverb" about a lawyer milking a cow for all it's worth.

In a later commentary, Smyth "effectively incorporated Henderson's comments," the CBSC found.

Their comments violated the Code of Ethics of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters (CAB), which states that "broadcasters shall endeavor to ensure ... that their programming contains no abusive or discriminatory ... comment," the CBSC decision said.

The CBSC administers the industry's voluntary code of ethics.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber said, "The only thing we would have hoped from the CBSC was that it would recognize the strong necessity of the owners [of CHUM] to take responsibility for Henderson's commentary," said Farber. He contrasted their response to that of CFTR, whose apology was unequivocal.

A very busy week

Last week was a very busy and momentous one for Israel. On the day that Israel celebrated the 48th anniversary of its independence, the Palestine National Council (PNC) revoked the clauses in the PLO Covenant calling for Israel's destruction. The vote was overwhelming even as the debate was heated: 504 members of the council voted in favor of cancelling the odious provisions; 54 voted against; and 14 abstained. The result was all the more remarkable in light of the ongoing closure of the West Bank and Gaza, and the bombing campaign in southern Lebanon.

The provisions were cancelled, but no new provisions were enacted to replace them. Nor will any be enacted soon. The PNC will authorize a committee to draft a new charter within the next six months. Thus, a measure of ambiguity concerning the charter still hangs in the air. We do not know what will replace what was cancelled.

But this irritating, ambiguous piece of not-quite-finished-business should not overshadow the importance of what was accomplished. We agree with Prime Minister Shimon Peres when he described the event as one of "historical importance." Even Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu referred to it as a "positive move," although incomplete.

The revocation allows the peace train to keep its forward momentum, albeit slowly. The Oslo agreements will be implemented, leading in the next few weeks to the beginning of the final stage discussions. Moreover, and more importantly perhaps, the revocation – along with "the handshake," the joint police patrols, the joint economic ventures, the constant meetings and consultations between top officials and leaders – is another seed which hopefully, will sink deep roots and one day bear fruit in the field of psychological changes in the culture of mutual distrust and hatred.

The very next day, probably in response to the PNC vote, the Labor party finalized its election platform by eliminating the previous reference to its opposition to the existence of a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

The Labor party has concluded that a sovereign Palestinian state will constitute no more of a security risk to Israel than would a self-governing, autonomous but not fully sovereign state. And it is banking on the hope that most Israelis will reach the same conclusion.

With only one month remaining before the elections, the prime minister is offering the Israeli electorate a clear choice between the policies of the two large, mainstream parties. But because he has also promised the electorate that any final peace settlement with Syria or the Palestinians will be submitted to a national referendum, the Labor party platform may be seen as a reasonable risk. By moving so boldly, the government is also offering the non-extremist, non-fundamentalist Palestinians, whom it believes to be the majority, visible proof that the road toward peace is the one they should stay on.

The next day, Friday, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher was successful in brokering a ceasefire agreement between Israel and the Hezbollah. Not surprisingly, Hezbollah was not involved in the ceasefire discussions, even though they were the ones firing the rockets. Syria and Iran were the negotiating "partners," through the intercession of various countries, chief and most influential among which was the United States.

The agreement was not a breakthrough. It was committed to paper, but not signed. It was, formally, a set of understandings between Israel and Lebanon, but Lebanon is not an independent agent. The agreement was merely a recognition of the geopolitical facts in the region. Syria is the ruler of Lebanon; Hezbollah is the deadly, discordant instrument which it plays for its own purposes, despite knowing the consequences for the people of Lebanon. Among those purposes is Syria's desire to prove its indispensability for securing peace in the region. Sadly, that may be all too true.

Rabbi Braun's family deserves love

I was dismayed to read about the Jewish community's attitude toward the adopted family of Rabbi Braun. I never read a more heart-warming story about unwanted children.

If we Jews are so intolerant, what can we expect from the Christian community?

Hitler did not ask if we had brown or blue eyes, the color of our skin, or if we were Orthodox or Reform Jews. We all had the same fate.

Ibolya Kaczer

Jews should be kinder to each other

I was saddened and disheartened when I read about the "revolting" and "obnoxious" treatment the Braun children experienced in Toronto because of the color of their skin.

Having grown up in Toronto, a Jew in a predominantly Jewish neighborhood, I can honestly say I have seen the effects of snobbery and elitism in our community.

I am forever reading articles about the problem of Jewish continuity. Maybe it's time we Jews learn to treat each other just a little more kindly, for if we don't who will?

Don't cancel trips to Israel

Following the recent bus bombings in Israel, I have begun to hear that many Jews who were planning to visit Israel this summer have cancelled their trips. I think that is tragic. Jews should not show weakness when facing the enemy. We are giving the enemy a prize when we do that.

Israel today doesn't need and is not asking for volunteers from the Diaspora to help them defend the country. But we here must "show that flag" also.

We must give Israel moral support, especially in difficult times. I ask those of your readers who were planning to go to Israel this summer not to cancel their trips, for their own dignity and that of the Jewish people.

Moshe Maurice Sadeh

Israelis thanked family for visit

My family and I recently returned from a 13-day bar/bat mitzvah tour of Israel. Yes, we were unnerved by the recent spate of suicide bombings but decided to proceed. On our tour, we felt safe and at ease. I just want to reassure others who are planning a trip. Keep in mind you can't completely negate the reality of the irrational choices of the terrorist — consider Oklahoma City and the World Trade Centre.

On a number of occasions, Israelis thanked us for making a statement of moral and spiritual support by coming to Israel. Israelis have to stay there and deal with the daily anxiety; what they need is our presence. The economy seems healthy. It was interesting to note the number of Christian tourists who had not been deterred by all of the negative press.

Lynn Blufarb

A view of the Israel-Hezbollah crisis

An argument is emerging that Israel's military campaign in southern Lebanon is unjustified. We disagree in large part, because over the past two months, Hezbollah has been launching rocket attacks on northern Israeli communities from southern Lebanon. The Israeli military initiative was a legitimate response to this dangerous Hezbollah provocation. Every nation has the right to defend the territorial integrity of its borders and prevent attacks upon its citizens.

The suggestion that Prime Minister Shimon Peres responded in order to boost his electoral prospects is insulting, especially since Peres delayed Israeli retaliation in search of a political solution. Similarly, the implicit suggestion from many that the answer is for Israel to unilaterally withdraw from its small security zone in southern Lebanon is facile, since the long-term problem is that the Lebanese governments have historically been unable/unwilling to prevent others from using Lebanese territory to attack Israel.

This is not to say that the Israeli military action is without problems. The targeting — albeit unintentional — of densely populated centres in Lebanon is highly questionable and seriously undermines Israel's legitimate military actions in southern Lebanon. Since Hezbollah are cowardly, holding the Lebanese population hostage as they hide behind them to wage their attacks, some loss of innocent Lebanese lives is unfortunately inevitable. However, Israel's policy of immediately and automatically (i.e. without human intervention) using radar technology to return fire in the direction from which it originated is inappropriate, albeit understandable. The current situation in Lebanon is extremely complicated. The current Israeli government has consistently chosen the political over the military option whenever possible.

Can Jewish refugees apply?

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Late last year, the Federal Court of Canada issued a ruling that sent a shudder through Canadian Jewry.

To some, it summoned the ghosts of decades past, when Jews claiming terrible persecution in the old country would clamor to get into Canada, and be refused by a now well-documented policy of "none is too many."

The November court ruling threatened to turn immigration law on its ear, stunned those who work with refugee claimants and sounded the loudest alarm bells in the Jewish community in years.

Today, a good measure of that initial anxiety has dissipated, thanks to studies and rulings that have taken the edge off the original decision. But some immigration lawyers and refugee advocates still cast a wary eye at Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), praying its panel members do not rely on the court's decision as a precedent.

In a nutshell, the court upheld an earlier IRB ruling that denied refugee status to a 65-year-old Jewish woman from Azerbaijan on the grounds that as a Jew, she could go live in Israel.

The court agreed with the IRB panel that because she is Jewish, Antonina Grygorian could have taken advantage of Israel's Law of Return, which guarantees citizenship to any Jew wishing to settle there.

Grygorian fled violent anti-Semitic persecution in Azerbaijan and came to Canada in 1994 to join her daughter. Although she has shown no interest in settling in Israel, she could have obtained Israeli citizenship "by a mere formality of application," the IRB panel had stated.

The decision was appealed, but Federal Court Judge Marcel Joyal agreed with the IRB, saying Canada's protection is "not a quick fix" and should only go to those who do not have "ready and automatic right to another country's nationality."

Joyal's six-page ruling, the first of its kind, outraged lawyers and Jewish refugee advocates, who feared that Canada's doors were closing for good to all Jewish asylum seekers — including those who have no connection to Israel — simply because they are Jews. For them, the court's message was, if you're Jewish, go to Israel, which must take you in.

To others, including Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), the ruling was reminiscent of Ottawa's dismal record of admitting Jewish refugees fleeing Nazism in the 1930s and '40s.

Indeed, Irving Abella, co-author of None is Too Many, wrote in the Globe and Mail that "once again — but for different reasons — Jews have been singled out as inadmissible. If the Grygorian ruling is followed, Jews will be barred."

Potentially, so could other refugees. Lawyers believe the ruling means that from now on, claimants will have to prove they have nowhere else to go, leaving Canada a nation of last resort.

A few weeks ago, officials of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) raised the matter in a meeting with Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard.

Robillard was aware of the ruling but indicated there wasn't much she could do about a court decision, said CJC national executive director Jack Silverstone.

But Silverstone used the meeting to point out a supreme irony in Canadian immigration rules, namely, that Grygorian could, in theory, go to Israel and then return to Canada claiming refugee status because she had been "persecuted" in the Jewish state. Hundreds of ex-Soviet Jews have successfully springboarded to Canada via Israel, using that argument.

Today, Grygorian, now 66, awaits an assessment by immigration department officials on whether deporting her back to Azerbaijan or Russia, of which she's also a citizen, poses too high a risk. In the meantime, she lives in Toronto, where her daughter cannot afford to sponsor her.

Joyal denied her lawyer, Yehuda Levinson, permission to appeal the ruling.

Levinson told The CJN his "gravest concern" is if Grygorian is deported to Azerbaijan, where anti-Semitism is "rampant."

She cannot be deported to Israel, since she's not a citizen there, Levinson added. "It's a classic catch-22." It's possible, he said, that Grygorian can be allowed to stay in Canada on grounds of compassion.

If all else fails in Canada, Levinson said he will take the case to Amnesty International or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva.

He and others say the ruling grossly misinterprets the Law of Return, which does not grant automatic citizenship to all Jews, and requires that immigrants actually be in Israel to make a claim.

There have been several recent developments in the case, among them:

- Just last week, immigration lawyer David Matas received a decision he said "will put an end to the uncertainty generated by the Grygorian decision."

A Winnipeg IRB panel boldly repudiated the ruling when it granted refugee status to a Jewish claimant from Russia. It found that "in contrast to the Grygorian decision, the claimant would have no ready and automatic right to Israeli nationality."

Matas said it would be "perverse" for panels to follow the Federal Court ruling and not this decision.

- In Montreal, a coalition of lawyers and refugee advocates, in a statement titled No Jews Need Apply, called on the chair of the IRB to issue guidelines to panel members to prevent future decisions "based on incomplete information and faulty logic."

But last week, John Frecker, the IRB's deputy chair, told The CJN the board will not be issuing guidelines, leaving individual panels to arrive at their own decisions.

"We don't think it's timely to issue guidelines at this point. This is better resolved by the courts," he said.

Frecker explained that the IRB issues advice to members only when courts arrive at divergent opinions, "to clarify confusion."

He said the board is waiting for other court rulings. "The sooner we get clarification, the better."

- The Canadian Council for Refugees has issued a scathing response to the Grygorian ruling, pointing out that "it is clearly not the case that Jews throughout the world are Israeli citizens. Potential nationalities are not relevant."

The council notes that Israel does not have to take in all Jews. Israel can refuse anyone it believes poses a health, criminal or security risk.

The council also points out that the Law of Return requires a person's desire to settle in Israel.

The Grygorian decision does not establish a precedent, in the council's view.

- Ian Fine, an Ottawa immigration lawyer, said that in the past 10 cases he's argued in which there has been a Jewish claimant, not once did the panel find that Israel is a country of nationality.

Fine believes the Grygorian matter is a "non-issue."

His opinion is bolstered by a recent IRB decision granting refugee status to a Jewish couple from Moldova, and stating that the Grygorian ruling should not be relied upon as a precedent.

It is "improper," the panel stated, to conclude that the Federal Court has told the IRB to assign Israeli nationality to all Jews.

The court's finding "does not stand for the principle that Israeli citizenship is automatic to all Jews ... The spirit of the Law of Return was not to force Israeli nationality on all Jews but rather to ensure that Israel would be a homeland open to all Jews desiring to settle there ... It is not an automatic process."

But decisions by IRB panels are notoriously inconsistent. Those in Toronto and Montreal are said to be stricter than panels in Ottawa and Western Canada. Some lawyers are less sanguine about how the Grygorian decision will affect future rulings.

- Montreal immigration lawyer Mitchell Goldberg said some hearing officers are using the Grygorian decision to deny asylum to Jews.

Panel members have invoked the ruling to deny refugee status to his clients, who fled anti-Semitic persecution in Russia, Georgia and Kazakhstan, Goldberg was quoted as telling a Montreal newspaper.

- Harvey Savage, a Toronto immigration lawyer, has found much the same thing. He said he had three hearings last month involving Jewish claimants from ex-Soviet republics, and in each, decisions were reserved.

"I would have gotten positive decisions on the spot" before the Grygorian ruling. Now, panels "are a little bit edgy.

"I sense the jury is still out on this. If the Grygorian ruling does become a precedent, then Jews need not apply to come to Canada."

"Every Jew has the right to Israeli citizenship. Israeli authorities have no discretion to refuse ... In Canada, the claimant, upon arrival, is but a refugee claimant with many hurdles to overcome before obtaining the right to Canadian citizenship. In Israel, upon arrival, she can, by expressing an intent to settle, be a citizen of Israel...

...the claimant is not a person who truly requires or genuinely needs protection – that protection is available to her in Israel, where she has an absolute right to citizenship, where the authorities have no discretion to refuse her and where, by her own testimony, she has no fear of persecution ... it would be perverse not to find Israel to be a country of nationality."

–Immigration and Refugee Board, in the matter of Antonina Grygorian.

"It is a long and sad story, but to members of the [Immigration and Refugee] Board, one that they here time and time again. After finding that Russian nationality, Azerbaijan nationality and Israeli nationality are open to the claimant by simple demand, the Board ruled that any other more liberal approach or less stringent obligation would violate the underlying rationale of refugee law as a remedy of last resort.

"In my view of the evidence before the Board, I cannot conclude that its decision is unreasonable. Nor can I criticize it on the basis of current refugee law for concluding that the applicant is entitled to Russian nationality by reason of her birth there in 1930, and that she is entitled to Israeli nationality under the provisions of Law of Return.'

Jewish studies growing in Russia

By Michael Brown

This spring the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University is inaugurating an exchange agreement with the State Pedagogical Institute in Rostov-on-Don in southern Russia, the first such agreement between a Canadian and a Russian university. Contact between the two institutions was established earlier this year, when I attended a conference in Moscow of professors of Jewish Studies in universities of the former Soviet Union. There I met with two Jewish Studies professors from Rostov, one a Jew and one a non-Jew.

The February conference, which was funded by the American Joint Distribution Committee but organized and sponsored by Sefer, the Russian association for Jewish Studies, brought together researchers and teachers in Russian-Jewish history, but also in Hebrew language, Bible, Jewish law, and other areas which we might expect to find in any full Jewish studies program in North America.

I was one of only a few non-Russian academics invited; the others were Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, Profs. Nehemia Levitzion of the Hebrew University, Ernest Frerichs of Brown University, Antony Polonsky from Brandeis and John Klier of the University of London. Levtzion was also representing the International Centre for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization under the Auspices of the President of Israel, the organization that spawned Sefer and has continued to nurture its growth.

One other notable academic at the conference was the Israeli ambassador in Moscow, Prof. Aliza Shinhar, a noted folklore scholar now on leave from Haifa University. Shinhar delivered greetings to the plenary and a scholarly paper, and she met privately over dinner with a few of us.

Most inspiring was the presence of some 50 graduate and undergraduate students whose commitment to the field ensures the future of Jewish studies in the states of the former Soviet Union. Also encouraging was the attendance of a vice-president of the Russian Academy of Sciences, which has recently admitted Sefer as a constituent society.

Exchange

My previous visit to the Soviet Union 12 years ago had as its purpose succoring refuseniks and bringing them contraband Jewish studies material proscribed by the regime. That only a few years later I would be speaking at a conference of professors of Jewish studies at Russian universities held in the Academy of Sciences was unimaginable then. Most of the refusenik leaders I met in 1984 have left Russia and are now in Israel. Miraculously, however, a new generation of effective intellectual and communal leaders has emerged to take their place.

One of the students at the conference was Motya Tschlenow, a descendant of Yehiel Tschlenow, a supporter of Herzl and a pioneer Russian Zionist who headed the All-Russian Zionist Convention in 1917. As we all know, Russia is hardly without its problems, including anti-Semitism. But Jewish life is being resurrected, and the mood at the conference was upbeat.

The professors and students are looking forward to a more knowledgeable Jewish future. That is what led Brandeis to make an exchange agreement with Kiev University, and York to do so with the Rostov State Pedagogical Institute; in the future, we expect one with Rostov State University, as well.

As the first stage of our exchange, two York professors, Martin Lockshin and Bernard Zelechow, will be travelling to Rostov next month for a week of intensive lectures on Jewish studies. Their trip is being sponsored by York's Centre for Jewish Studies and by the Canadian International Development Agency and the Association of Colleges and Universities in Canada Professional Partnerships Program. We hope in the not-too-distant future to host lecturers from Rostov at York, especially in the field of Russian-Jewish studies. And we look forward to an exchange of students as well. The Rostov academics believe they can build for the future through substantive contacts with Canada. And we at York can learn a great deal from the experiences and expertise of our Rostov colleagues. We look forward to the collaboration.

Saving the children of Chernobyl

By Carl Alpert

At a time when the news from Israel is not always bright and encouraging, we report on a heart-warming, life-saving project which is little known, and even less understood. This is the ongoing rescue of the Jewish children of Chernobyl.

Though the nuclear disaster in the Ukrainian city occurred 10 years ago in April 1986, and took a death toll which by now has exceeded 125,000, the hideous effects are still claiming victims who remain in or near the contaminated areas.

Known in Czarist times as the Pale of Settlement, this area was home to millions of Jews; and several hundred thousand still reside there, though their numbers are dwindling rapidly as the children, most susceptible to the radiation-induced cancers, are dying young.

Six years ago, the Chabad movement initiated a rescue program which is comparable to the origins of the Youth Aliyah movement. In the present instance, Jewish families in the Chernobyl area place their children in the humanitarian care of Chabad and send them to Israel, where they are provided with crucial medical treatment and given the opportunity to grow up in a healthy environment. To date, close to 1,300 youngsters have been saved and given a new lease on life.

What is remarkable about this program — and sad, too — is that no help whatsoever is provided by any of the major Jewish rescue bodies — not the Joint Distribution Committee, not the Jewish Agency, not the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society. All funds are raised privately by Chabad through individual donors. Several thousand children have been registered on the waiting list by their parents, but their turn can come only when funds are available for the flight and for their housing, education and medical care in Israel.

The children, aged from about six to 15, arrive in Israel as tourists and do not receive the benefits given by the government to new immigrants. They are housed at Kfar Chabad in the centre of the country, where a complete network of educational and medical facilities has been set up. They are clothed. They can phone home to their parents from time to time.

The sponsors pay for everything, for every band-aid. The Hadassah Hospital provides medical and clinical services, but I was shocked to hear that it charges Chabad full rates for the use of its facilities.

Even on its relatively limited scale, what Chabad is doing for the Jewish children of Ukraine, exceeds what the UN and all the agencies are doing for the general population of the area. The major international effort in Chernobyl is being devoted now to research, to learn what to do in case of a repetition of a similar disaster elsewhere.

The program is based on a two-year stay at Kfar Chabad. At the end of that period, in most cases, the parents come here as olim, pick up their healthy children and recommence family life with new homes and jobs.

The facilities at Kfar Chabad are spartan but comfortable. The children, who in Ukraine had been completely detached from any Jewish awareness, are taught Hebrew and English, and get a full academic program equivalent to what would be provided in many Jewish day schools.

Medical care and attention are crucial, for many arrive with early symptoms of thyroid cancer and/or immune systems affected by their exposure to radiation back home.

Hundreds of Chabad personnel give their services in this life-saving undertaking. For example, Milwaukee-born Jay Litvin, who serves as medical director and liaison with world bodies, has immersed himself in the program.

With a minimum of bureaucracy and a shoestring budget, and with insufficient publicity, the Chabad Children of Chernobyl project serves as a shining example of Judaism and Israel at their best.

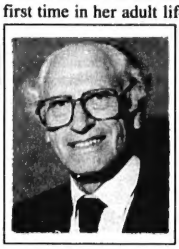
Use it or lose it



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

In 1961 our family, including Mother, moved to Toronto.

She was in her early 70s and for the first time in her adult life did not work for a living. She became active in the community and then, one memorable day, she decided to make up for lost time and get an education. When she was 88, the University of Toronto became her new intellectual habitat. She had last seen school desks some 70-plus years before. It was a radical move, going by the standards of society.

Justifiably, in the course of her studies and the eventual attainment of an honorary BA from the university at age 100, she became a celebrity. In the process she had taught fellow students — most of them in their 20s — something that the professors could not get across to them in the same fashion: that education was a lifelong experience. When she died three years ago, she had converted many to the belief that age was an opportunity to learn and grow, rather a time to retract and shrivel.

Modern researchers have emphasized the truth of what she demonstrated in her life: that mental activity and continued study are, in fact, securing the continued acuity of the brain. Humans, so the latest studies prove, will lose muscle power as they age, while the brain follows a different rule, for it is not a muscle but a unique structure all by itself. It is kept alive by mental stimulation, and the more the aging person will diversify his/her interests and will face intellectual challenges, the more certain one may be of maintaining the continued proper and vital functioning of the brain.

"Use it or lose it" was a theory proposed some 30 years ago, when experiments at the University of California at Berkley showed that mental stimulation alters the brain structure and chemistry in rats. Since then, both animals and humans have been shown to have greater brain activity when the neurons in the brain are challenged and sprout dendrites, which are like branches on a tree. The more dendrites, the more communication there is between cells.

People who continue mental activity — and the more varied the better — literally upgrade their computer and thereby acquire a bigger capacity and memory. Researchers believe that there is a direct correlation between the density of dendrites and the amount of learning in which a person engages.

A recent article in the Bulletin of the American Association of Retired Persons brings this home and suggests a series of steps to maintain one's brain power. The more a person can take control of his/her life, the better the brain will age, which means abandoning the idea that with retirement one no longer has to think.

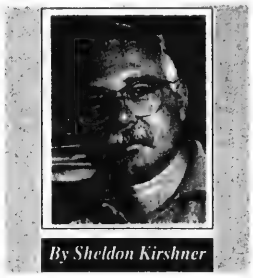
"That's a mistake, because the way to have an active mind in the later years is to think of education as a lifelong process," said Prof. Warner Schaie, a professor at Penn State University. My mother did not know about him, but simply did it and enjoyed every moment of it.

The Kirshner File

Separation policy fraught with uncertainties

Israel is battling the forces of Islamic fundamentalism on two fronts.

In the north, from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, Israel is fighting a war of attrition against Hezbollah, which is supported by Iran, the bastion of Islamic fundamentalism. Last week's ceasefire ended the latest round of warfare, but failed to resolve the underlying problems between Israel and Hezbollah.



By Sheldon Kirshner

As fighting raged in Lebanon, Israel was busy building a two-kilometre wide security zone along its winding demarcation line with the West Bank, part of a system of patrol zones, fences, special crossing points and electronic barriers designed to deter Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombers.

The new security measures, which are expected to take two years to implement, were adopted by Israel's cabinet on March 4 after the fourth suicide bombing in nine days to convulse Israel. These attacks left 58 people dead, battered confidence in the Oslo peace process and bolstered the prospects of the Likud bloc in the May 29 general election.

The concept of separation was originally unveiled by the late Yitzhak Rabin, following a suicide bombing in January 1995 in Beit Lid which killed 22 Israelis. Rabin envisioned a complex of fences, fixed positions and mobile patrols by infantry, armor and helicopters to seal off Israel from the West Bank. (A fence erected in 1994 and 1995 already encloses the Gaza Strip).

Rabin, however, had second thoughts about separation when the concept was found to be unworkable and far too costly.

In the wake of the latest wave of suicide bombings, Rabin's successor, Shimon Peres, revived the idea. Peres did so reluctantly, having always opposed separation as contrary to the spirit and letter of Israel's agreements with the PLO.

Peres, whose vision of a "new Middle East" includes economic integration between Israel and the Palestinian autonomous areas in Gaza and the West Bank, once argued that separation would undermine Israel's accords with the Palestine Authority and sow hardship for Palestinians in the territories who depend on Israel for a livelihood.

But faced with the spectre of a deadly bombing campaign by Islamic radicals to destroy the Oslo accords and to eliminate his chances of defeating Benjamin Netanyahu at the polls, Peres opted for separation over integration.

It was, relatively speaking, a painless decision for Peres. Most Israelis, as well as Peres' chief cabinet ministers (notably Foreign Minister Ehud Barak and Minister Without Portfolio Yossi Beilin), favor separation as a necessity.

Yet separation hardly enjoys universal support. Closure of the territories — an inevitable byproduct of separation — deprives about 70,000 Palestinian day laborers of their hard-earned salaries, costs the struggling Palestinian economy about $3 million per day in direct and indirect expenditures, discredits the Palestine Authority and its rapprochement with Israel, and enhances Hamas' image. Besides, virtually none of the terrorism of the past three years has been perpetrated by Palestinian workers.

Separation, too, is an anathema to the political right in Israel, since it implicitly resurrects the old Green Line, accepts the inevitability of a Palestinian state and leaves Jewish settlements in the territories more isolated and exposed to Arab attacks.

And there are qualms about separation in Israel's left-wing camp, turning on the argument that it reduces the mainly Arab-populated territories into a pool of cheap labor for Israeli agriculture and industry.

The left-of-centre Meretz party, a member of the governing coalition, backs separation as a practical step to combat terrorism. But Meretz's platform leans toward a demilitarized Palestinian state.

No matter how you look at it, separation is a dicey notion. It is a tool in Israel's arsenal against Islamic fundamentalism, yet it is fraught with political, economic and moral ambiguities and uncertainties.

Kibbutzim marching to beat of materialism

Collectivism, once a sacrosanct tenet on kibbutzim, is being replaced by individualism.

As Israeli society grows more prosperous, Israelis are marching to the irresistible beat of materialism, and kibbutzim like Yahel, about 65 kilometres north of Eilat, have been deeply affected by this change.

Yahel, a mainly farming community founded 19 years ago as a joint venture of the United Kibbutz Movement (Takam) and the Movement for Progressive Jewry, has moved away from the model of the traditional kibbutz.

In 1989, Yahel became one of the first kibbutzim to give its members partial control of personal budgets. "It gave people the opportunity to be more independent," said Hillel Tobias, the former treasurer, in a recent interview.

Under the new system, free vacations and the communal laundry vanished, while subsidies for personal clothing, furniture and electric and telephone bills were eliminated.

Instead, outside consultants recommended that members receive a larger individual budget, with more freedom to set their own priorities. As a result, the kibbutz is spending less money and members have greater autonomy.

Yahel, however, still maintains the vestiges of a collective community. The kibbutz supplies members' meals — two of which are taken in the communal dining room — and looks after education and health costs.

In another departure from kibbutz tradition, kids sleep at home, not in a children's house, but this has been the case at Yahel since its beginning.

The economy of Yahel — an oasis in the Arava desert — is based in part on field crops like melons, peppers, onions, pomelos and tomatoes.

The harvest, much of which is exported to Western Europe during the winter season, is gathered by members with the help of Israeli Bedouin migrant workers and overseas volunteers. (Of late, some of the volunteers have been French Canadians.)

Two-thirds of Yahel's residents are Sabras, with the rest from the United States, South Africa, Britain and South America.

The other pillars of Yahel's economy are a dairy herd, fish ponds, guided tours of the Negev and Arava, and a seminar centre with educational programming.

Some members commute to jobs in the area.

Despite the diversified nature of its economy, Yahel requires the assistance of the Diaspora. Through its Project Renewal link with the Toronto Jewish community, Yahel receives funds for adult education programs and equipment for a youth lounge and a seminar centre.

Conceived by the late Menachem Begin, Project Renewal is a partnership between the Israeli government, the Jewish Agency and individual Diaspora communities. Its overarching purpose is to improve the quality of life in Israel.

Insurance benefits may be sold

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

What does a terminally ill patient do when his medical fees and other expenses become so exorbitant that he does not have the resources or income to meet his needs?

Comparative Law

One solution currently available is known as a viatical settlement. Simply put, this allows a terminally ill patient to sell the benefits of his life insurance policy to another, usually for around 50 to 60 percent of its value. The patient gets the money now in return for naming the investor as his beneficiary.

In response to the AIDS epidemic, over 60 viatical settlement firms were established during the last five years, creating a multi-billion dollar industry.

Some praise this idea as a way of providing desperately needed money at a time when the patient and his family really need it for medications, medical help and family support. Others oppose it, viewing it as a ghoulish way of taking financial advantage of people in desperate situations and of leaving the heirs vulnerable following the death of their loved one.

What is the opinion of Jewish law? A Talmudic parallel to the modern life insurance policy is the ketubah, a contract entered into between a husband and a wife at the time of their marriage, which, among other things, guarantees to a woman a certain amount of money in the event that the marriage ends in divorce or in her husband's death. At a time when a woman did not control her own financial assets during marriage and did not inherit her husband's estate, the ketubah was especially important to protect her interests.

Nevertheless, if a woman is in great financial need, she has the legal right to sell her ketubah and to assign it to others (Baba Kama 89b). In other words, for a certain amount of money that she receives now, she assigns to the buyer the proceeds of the ketubah that would normally be due to her at the end of her marriage. The purchase of a ketubah is a greater financial risk to the buyer than the purchase of a life insurance policy, because the wife receives her ketubah only in the case of divorce or her husband's death. If she predeceases him, no ketubah is paid.

The sale of the ketubah, however, may not be absolute. If a banin dichrin clause is added to the ketubah, i.e., that the children will inherit their mother's ketubah, the children can claim their inheritance despite the sale. This is because it was her pressing need for money that compelled her to assign her ketubah to others, but other conditions of the ketubah are still in force and due her as well.

It seems to me that the selling of a life insurance policy is similar to the sale of a ketubah and is permissible under Jewish law. Regulated properly, it may even be an act of great kindness which enables the terminally ill recipient to receive funds, in order to care for himself and his family in a dignified way. It may also relieve the community of the great financial burden of providing for an indigent patient. And if civil law allows all of the benefits to be assigned to another, Jewish law respects those conditions.

However, there is a moral obligation to consider the financial welfare of a patient's family. Clearly, it is the pressing need for money which compels a terminally ill patient to assign the benefits of his life insurance policy to others. Efforts should be made to ensure that the patient's family will not face a financial crisis with the death of their loved one.

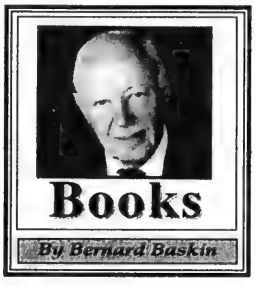
Jews helped to boost legal, civil rights



Search Out The Land by Sheldon J. Godfrey & Judith C. Godfrey, McGill-Queen's University Press $34.95

This impressive book has two basic aims, both of which are admirably achieved: to show how, over a century and a half, early Canada established the civil and legal rights of its religious minorities, and to describe the role of Jews in the development of that society.

The authors assert that "Jews through the milennia had wandered from one place to another searching for a land where they could be granted equal status and put down roots." Those who ventured into British North America, a huge and unsullied land of infinite promise, spread the good news to those in the "old country" in search of freedom and opportunity. Immigrants came slowly at first and later in substantial numbers. Jews and what was to become Canada were an agreeable match.

But the road to equality was replete with barriers; it was not quickly or easily travelled. This scholarly account reveals how the legal and political restrictions in the British North American colonies were gradually overcome. In 1831, the legislature of Lower Canada (now Quebec) decided that Jews were as equal as other citizens under the law. This enactment, the first of its kind in the British Empire, erased the injustice done to the Jews of Quebec when 20 or so years earlier, Ezekiel Hart, twice elected to the assembly was denied his position because he could not take the Christian oath of office.

The Quebec ordinance led, in time, to the elimination of the unfair oath throughout British North America.

In the most famous battle in Canadian history on the Plains of Abraham just outside Quebec City, in which the British conquered the French to capture all of Canada, few people know that two of the key players were Jewish. Alexander Shonberg, a Jew who was forced to convert to enlist in the British Navy, captained the largest ship in the British fleet. On the other hand, Abraham Gradis, a French Jew, was the major supplier of arms, food, supplies and soldiers to the French army.

The first Jewish immigrant we know about was a young boy who arrived in Quebec 250 years ago. When he was questioned, he confessed that he was not really Christian and not even a male. In fact, he was a she, an 18-year-old French Jewish girl. Esther Brandou wanted to travel and could not do so as a girl. So she disguised herself and took various masculine jobs. Finally, she became a sailor and landed in Quebec. The authorities tried to deport her unless she converted, since no Jews were allowed in Quebec. But Esther was steadfast and determined. Eventually, after a year of failed effort, she was shipped back home by the French authorities.

What will undoubtedly interest most readers is the description of the lives and accomplishments of some of the more than 100 Jewish pioneers and their families in the years between 1750 and 1840. Among them were George Benjamin of Belleville, Ont., who in 1863, was offered a position as minister of the crown; Ezekiel Solomons, a successful and intrepid fur trader; and the many members of the astonishing Hart family. Aaron Ezekiel Hart was the first Jewish barrister and solicitor in British North America. Aaron Philip Hart was appointed postmaster of Trois Rivières.

Sheldon Godfrey, a Toronto lawyer, and his wife Judith, a heritage conservationist, have carefully researched hitherto unexplored material. What they discovered about Jews and freedom in early Canada will be of immense interest to all students of history.

Jewish Life

A Lag b'Omer in Jerba

On May 7, Jewish communities around the world will celebrate the holiday of Lag b'Omer. Its name means, literally, the 33rd day in the counting of the Omer, which is tallied from the second day of Passover until Shavuot. Thus the holiday always falls on the 18th day of the month of Iyar.

Guest Voices

The origin of the holiday is uncertain. Some sources attribute the holiday to its being the last day of a devastating plague which took the lives of thousands of Rabbi Akiva's students. Some people state that the students did indeed die but not by plague. Rather they died in revolt against the Roman occupiers. Other people consider the date of the holiday to be the anniversary of the death of the great and mystic Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, considered to be the author of the Zohar.

Lag b'Omer is a festive occasion celebrated in many different ways.

The CJN asked Sarah Taieb-Carlen, professor of sociology at York University in Toronto and an expert on Sephardi folklore to write about the Lag b'Omer celebrations among the Jews of Jerba in North Africa.

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

Jerba is a small island off the shore of Tunisia in North Africa.

Local tradition maintains that Jewish settlement there dates back thousands of years. According to the Encyclopedia Judaica, the history of the Jews of Jerba includes three periods of serious persecution: in the 12th century under the Almohads; in 1519 under the Spanish; and more recently, in 1943 under the Nazis.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, the yeshivot of Jerba produced many rabbis and writers and provided rabbis for the communities of North Africa. In 1946, there were approximately 4,900 Jews in Jerba in al-Hara al-Saghira, al-Hara al-Kabir and Houmt-Souk, the principal town of the island. By the late 1960s, their number had dwindled to about 1,500.

It is believed that several kohanim escaped from Jerusalem to Jerba in 586 BCE, carrying with them a door and a few stones from the first Temple which they used to build the synagogue called the Ghriba.

According to historian Nahum Slouschz, who visited Jerba in 1905, much folklore exists about the synagogue and the site on which it was built.

One such tale revolves around a mysterious, beautiful young woman who lived all alone in a hut of branches that she had built by herself on a small deserted hill. She carried herself with such dignity that no one dared approach her.

One day, the people of the community saw flames devouring the hut. When the fire subsided, they found the girl's body, lifeless but untouched by the fire.

They interpreted this tragic event in metaphysical terms. They "understood" that she had been a saint, that they should have helped her in her solitude and that they should have acknowledged her holy character.

To acknowledge their omission and to commemorate her life, they built a synagogue, the Ghriba, meaning "the extraordinary," on the site of the hut.

To this day, once a year, pilgrims visit the synagogue. The pilgrimage, ziyara in Judeo-Tunisian, begins a month after Pesach and culminates on Lag b'Omer. It goes on between the 14th and the 18th of Iyar, the anniversaries of the deaths of Rabbi Meir baal Hanes and Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai, respectively, two very important figures of North African Judaism.

The pilgrims come to the Ghriba one by one. They enter the outer hall, take off their shoes, cover their head, devote themselves for a short while to solitary worship, and then proceed to the inner sanctuary where everyone lights a candle and makes a silent vow.

The pilgrims walk through the synagogue to kiss the ark of the Torah.

Under the ark is an alcove lit up by candles. Popular belief holds that this is the very spot where the young girl's body was found.

Visitors usually place one or more eggs inscribed with the name of an unmarried girl on the floor of the alcove. At the end of the day, they come back to retrieve their egg, which by then is thoroughly baked by the heat from the many candles illuminating the alcove. People believe that if a girl eats the egg that had her name, she will be successful in finding a husband within a year.

On the 18th of Iyar, Lag b'Omer, the festivities are heightened by the participation of the local Jerbians, who on that day join the visitors from other communities. A large candelabrum, the menara, is put on display, slowly decorated and borne in procession from the Ghriba for a distance of one kilometre to the nearby community of Dighet.

The menara is a hexagonal pyramid mounted on three wheels and consisting of five levels. It depicts the community's conception of the hierarchy of the Jewish people.

Its base represents the 12 tribes of Israel, all the Jews of the world. The layer above represents many famous Tunisians scholars whose names mingle at the third level with those of important biblical characters such as Abraham, Isaac, Rachel and Leah. The Hebrew inscription, which reads, "This candelabrum is in honor of Rabbi Meir Baal Hanes and Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai, may their merits assure us of protection," appears at the top of this level.

The name of God is inscribed in a Star of David on the fourth level. On the fifth and last level are the tablets of the law in silver, the crown of the menara.

Before the procession begins, the menara is wrapped in several layers of silk, which, together with the rimonim, the silver globes shaped as pomegranates, are sold during a lively auction that takes place in the courtyard of the synagogue, accompanied by music from the local orchestra and ululations from the women's gallery.

Once the last scarf has been sold, the procession sets out very slowly. The privilege of carrying the menara for just a few metres is offered to the highest bidder. The procession includes countless stops and it takes several hours to walk the kilometre between the village and the synagogue.

The orchestra is at the head of the march engaging people in the singing of cheerful piyutim, liturgical poems. The pilgrims follow and surround the menara. Some Muslims even join in the ceremony, whether simply to have fun or because, not infrequently, they also believe in the power of the Ghriba.

The fervor of the celebration and the enthusiasm of the day are hard to contain. Saying good-bye to the menara is very difficult indeed for the pilgrims.

Kinar stresses importance of recalling soldiers' sacrifices

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 1,500 people filled the sanctuary of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue for a sombre Yom Hazikaron assembly to honor the memory of those who fell in the struggle for the establishment of the State of Israel and in its defence.

Yom Hazikaron

Sponsored by the Consulate General of Israel in Toronto with the Israeli Boy and Girl Scouts Federation of Toronto, the ceremony began with the recitation of Yizkor in Hebrew by Brig.-Gen. (Res.) Doron Kadmiel and in English by Karen Menashe.

Taps was sounded by Ilan Gordon, as Imri Yung, Elad Winkler and Meron Darchenski of Zabar Scouts' Honor Guard lowered the Israeli flag to half-mast. Two minutes of silence followed.

Music, poetry, readings and speeches preceded Cantor Louis Danto's chanting of K'El Maleh Rachamim. Shimon Inbar recited Kaddish as a memorial candle was lit by Tsipi Erez, assisted by Zabar Scouts Roi Bar-Kat and Aviram Tzur.

Lighting the memorial candle at the Yom Hazikaron ceremony.

During the program, Israel David, Yitzhak Argaman and Reuven Zemer performed Ahai Giborei Ha'tehila, Ha'Kotel, and Dudu. Soloists Dafna Tzur and Ilana Millman sang Uri and They shall beat their swords into ploughshares, respectively.

Excerpts from the speech given by Yitzhak Rabin following the unification of Jerusalem were read in Hebrew by Maj. (Res.) Yehuda Marle.

Speaking in English and Hebrew, Yehudi Kinar, the Israeli consul general said we have to remember and remind others, especially the younger generation, of the sacrifice of the Israeli soldiers.

"We don't remember only the fallen soldiers, but all those who were killed and murdered so that we can live as it is written in our national anthem, Hatikvah — To live as a free nation in our country."

He said it was high time that the world reacted to the shocking acts of terror by Hamas and Hezbollah. "Conferences alone will not bring the solution. Wherever we are, we must fight against this new wave of terrorism by the enemies of Israel, but not of Israel alone."

This type of terrorism, he added, does not know or abide by any borders. "No distinction is made between toddlers, young mothers, the elderly or soldiers."

He noted that last year, 177 Israeli citizens were killed.

"When we speak of the victims for Israel's independence, the victims of terror are part of them. These soldiers and civilians were victims on a road which I hope will lead to the ultimate goal of peace."

Others participating in the memorial service included, Rabbi Barry Schneider, Lt.-Col. (Res.) Ehud Savion, Shimon Zer Aviv, Hagit Fishman, Shir Tsabari, Shir Landau, Galit Klein, Chen Tamir, Ayelet Berkowitz and Sharon Eshet.

Balagan on Bathurst turns into joyous celebration

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ezeh balagan.

Welcome to a little bit of Israel on Bathurst Street.

A voice boomed through the jam-packed Leah Posluns Theatre, asking the 450 or more present to raise their hands if they were sitting next to an empty seat so those standing could be seated.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Voices began shouting in Hebrew when some kids stubbornly tried to remain in the "seats" they'd made for themselves in the aisle. More announcements urged people to be seated so the program could begin.

The occasion was a community celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's 48th birthday, sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) Central region. Despite a shaky start that included staticky microphones and a singer's mike that wasn't even turned on, the evening's program turned into one of joyous singing and celebration.

Tillie Margolis, acting president of the CZF's central region, emceed the program, and Kurt Rothschild, national president of the CZF and Israel Consul General Jehudi Kinar offered brief remarks.

Traditional chassidic songs

Rothschild reflected on "the dream" of Israel in Jewish history, while Kinar recounted the tremendous advances the state has made in only 48 years. Its economy is booming, education is a priority and olim continue to migrate there at a rate of 60,000 per year, he said.

With the conclusion of Kinar's statement, the musical fun began.

Led by the three cantors, Louis "Luciano" Danto, Efraim "Placido" Sapir and Benjamin "Jose" Maissner, the audience was invited to sing along as the trio offered stirring renditions of traditional chassidic songs and more modern Israeli numbers. A particular favorite was Danto's moving solo performance of Av Harachamim.

They were followed by a performance of Our Jerusalem, a musical play in celebration of Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary.

Perhaps more appropriately titled King David and the Amazing Technicolor City Founder, the show owed as much to Andrew Lloyd whatshisname and current musical trends — including rap — than to traditional Jewish music. Nevertheless the singers were excellent and the costumes first rate.

The show traced the founding of Jerusalem to the modern day through music, dance and dialogue.

It was performed by a teenage cast under the leadership of Doron Ophir, musical director, and Rivka Atzmony, choreographer.

The show was produced by Roni Kadmiel of the Jewish National Fund and Tami Savion of CZF.

Experience Israel's Most Phenomenal Musical Talent

(Achinoam Nini)
and Gil Dor

live in concert at Convocation Hall
(University of Toronto)
May 22, 8:30 p.m.

An amazing synthesis of pop, jazz and world music.

Drawing on her Yemenite-Israeli heritage, Noa plays the Darbukkah (hand-held Arabic drum) and sings in English and Hebrew. In 1994, Noa and Gil were discovered by American jazz superstar Pat Metheny, who produced their first Geffen album which went Platinum (350,000 sold) in Israel and in France. Noa launched her North American career last year with a sold out performance at New York's Carnegie Hall.

Noa played with Yitzhak Rabin at the November 4 1995 peace rally, moments before the Israeli Prime Minister was assassinated. Her latest album "Calling" produced by Rupert Hine (producer for Tina Turner, Kate Bush and Rush) includes a tribute to Rabin and a song for the victims of Israel's latest bus bombings.

Tickets: TicketKing 872-1212, Matana Judaica (248 Steeles Avenue West), Edward's Record World (2359 Yonge Street)

Defeated presidential candidate Thomas Hecht, who at the committee's hearing in February described himself as the target of a "character assassination" attempt, does receive some sympathy in the report.

Noting Hecht's testimony that a "brown envelope" containing damaging allegations against him was sent anonymously to certain Montreal media,. the committee states "all people of goodwill and all those in the community with a yiddishe neshamah (Jewish soul) condemn such odious and pernicious behavior.

"This is especially distressing when the maligned person is a pillar of the community."

The committee recommends that applications for accreditation as an organizational delegate should be received no earlier than 45 days and no later than 30 days prior to the start of a plenary, and that approval of such delegates should be completed 14 days before the plenary.

The fact that organizational delegates may apply for accreditation up to and including the first day of the plenary is cited as "the most salient problem" at the 1995 plenary.

Under existing rules, with delegates at large chosen by the CJC regions a month in advance, candidates look to organizational delegates for additional support because of their much later deadline.

However, this system broke down at the last plenary when "hundreds" of applications were received during the week before and especially on Friday, May 12 and the 24 hours of Shabbat before the plenary opening Saturday night.

The result was up to six-hour waits to register, even for already accredited delegates.

The latest date for the election of delegates at large should remain 30 days before the plenary, as the bylaws now require, and only observers (who do not vote) should be registered at the plenary, the report says.

Each accredited delegate should receive by mail a form attesting to his entitlement to vote, and a delegates list should be published no later than 14 days before the plenary.

The report urges clarification and simplification of organizational representation. An eligible organization should be defined as one that has 50 or more members, holds at least one general meeting a year, and has an executive headed by a president. Qualifying organizations should register with CJC, and a list of approved organizations should be issued by CJC 30 days before the plenary.

Each would be entitled to appoint two delegates regardless of their membership, the report says.

The "good standing" requirement of all delegates should be spelled out as a minimum $18 contribution to one's local federation campaign.

In other recommendations, the committee says candidates for officer positions or those "who intend to play a prominent role in support" of a candidate should not be involved in organizing the plenary in the 90 days prior to its opening.

But despite what Climan said, Vineberg said no final decisions will be made until after the budgeting process gets into gear this month.

Moreover, Vineberg said cuts will not be made to the detriment of any particular program, service or agency seen a s a community priority.

"The framework we're working under are federation campaigns that have flattened down," Vineberg said, as well as situations such as government funding cutbacks to Jewish social services in Ontario and Jewish education in Quebec.

Although "it looks like there will be less dollars available," Vineberg said the goal will be "to keep the damage to a minimum."

Some members of the executive were quick to denounce the threatened cuts as part of a longstanding effort or trend to undermine the autonomy of CJC and to weaken or even eliminate it.

The executive committee approved the draft budget, despite it not being the final version, in an effort to "minimize the reductions" and "show some clout" when it sits down with CJF Canada.

"The future of CJC is on the line," said an angry Manuel Shacter, former chair of CJC's Quebec region, at the meeting of the executive.

Shacter accused Congress of being "complaint" for too long, and, as a result, CJC is "on its way out."

Frank Schlesinger, another member of the executive, said, "We can not let ourselves be whittled down and down and down like this."

"If we don't start to put a little starch in our backbone, it will be a disservice to the Jewish community."

"There is no easy way to resolve this," responded a frustrated Climan.

"I don't have any answers.

"The best information we had was that we would have the same amount as last year.

But now it's obvious "that something major is going to happen over time," he said.

The draft budget approved by the executive is divided roughly between national and regional programs, including for the first time $144,000 earmarked for CJC's national unity committee, 1/3 coming from FEDERATION CJA and the balance from CJF Canada and its "reserve fund."

Plans were also in the works to expand CJC's Ottawa operations.

Ottawa's 'warhorse' Gray fights toughest battle

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Herb Gray, the old Liberal warhorse and Canada's first Jewish cabinet minister, is fighting the toughest battle of his life.

Gray, who turns 65 next month, has been undergoing treatment for cancer of the esophagus, and has cut back on his office time, while he undergoes chemotherapy for the next four months.

It all came as a surprise to Gray who had successfully undergone his annual medical checkup only a month earlier.

About two weeks ago, he complained that he felt tired and lacked energy. For him, that meant something was wrong. He quickly went back for another medical examination at the Ottawa Civic Hospital.

The doctors there found small cell carcinoma of the lower esophagus, the swallowing tube for food that connects the mouth to the stomach.

Gray has always been in the best of health. He does not smoke and he drinks very little.

"It came as a real surprise. There was nothing like it in his family before. Both his parents lived well into their 90s," says Jerry Yanover, his trusted chief of staff, who was totally floored by the discovery of the cancer.

Cutting back his workload is something new for Gray, who is a pillar in the cabinet, a diligent 18-hour-a-day man, who works at his desk hour after hour without a break. Since 1994, he has been handling the portfolios of both government House leader and solicitor general, each one considered a full-time job in itself.

The doctors told Gray he has to stay at home while he undergoes chemotherapy, although he can come in to work on the weeks he is not taking treatment.

Gray called up one day last week from his home and growled at his staff, "So where are my files?"

Arrangements had been made to have his files shipped back and forth between his home and his office every day. Gray has also insisted that he be given a special briefing by aides every day after Question Period on who said what, and what happened.

"Chemo may affect how he feels," chuckles Yanover, "but it doesn't affect his brain any."

Gray went immediately to see Prime Minister Jean Chrétien as soon as the cancer was discovered and asked to stay on with a reduced workload. The prime minister approved the request before the treatment even began.

Gray was first elected in 1962, as a dedicated young Liberal MP and bright young lawyer from Windsor, Ont.

Seven years later, in 1969, then prime minister Pierre Trudeau appointed Gray minister without portfolio, on Oct. 20, 1969, making him the first Jew ever to sit in the federal cabinet.

Hard-working and discreet, Gray soon rose in the cabinet and a year later was appointed revenue minister. He went on to become president of the Treasury Board and eventually government House leader.

He holds the record as the dean of the Ottawa parliamentarians, the longest-serving MP in the Commons, an unbroken 34-year record.

Gray grew up in Windsor, the son of the local department store owner Harry Gray. The family came from Belarus at the turn of the century. The original family name was Gurarie, but as in the case of so many Jews who immigrated to Canada, an immigration official changed their name at the border — in this case to Gray.

Gray's mother was the late Fannie Lifitz.

Although Gray attended McGill University at a time when few Jews did, and later went to the Osgoode Hall Law School, Gray never forgot his family roots in Windsor nor his Jewish identity.

Gray doesn't make a big production of his being Jewish, but he did wear his yarmulke at his official swearing in as a minister into the Chrétien cabinet and posed for the official cabinet photograph with his head covered.

In Ottawa, he lives in the Alta Vista neighborhood near the Machzikei Hadas Synagogue on Virginia Drive, so he can easily walk to synagogue on the Sabbath. His second home in Windsor is also close to another synagogue he attends.

Last January, Gray was in Israel attending the World Congress of Jewish Parliamentarians.

At one point in the proceedings he ran into Lord Jacobovitz, the former chief rabbi of Great Britain, whom Margaret Thatcher had appointed to the House of Lords.

On being introduced to Gray, Rabbi Jacobovitz remarked: "Ah, Ottawa. My nephew is a rabbi in Ottawa."

Without missing a beat, Gray replied: "Yes, he's Rabbi Bulka and I go to his synagogue."

His lordship was pleased.

Sobolewski barred from meeting

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sigmund Sobolewski of Calgary, a Catholic survivor of Auschwitz, was denied the right to attend a special meeting of the Auschwitz International Council held April 30 in Poland to consider protecting the site from commercial encroachment.

Sobolewski said he was told by Stefan Wilkanowicz, council vice-chair, that he could not attend because of his public criticism of the director of the Auschwitz Museum.

"I think we should support Sobolewski's right to attend the meeting if it is not held in camera and the press is permitted to attend," said Nathan Leipciger of Toronto, the official delegate of the Canadian Jewish Congress to the council. "I don't agree with some of his attempts to gain international attention for the need to preserve Auschwitz but I agree with his objectives."

Look who's talking? BBYO's pioneering program

The BBYO Parent Teen Dialogue Program is turning into the organization's biggest hit of the year. The program, supported by a UJA Federation continuity grant, was created to encourage dialogue between parents and teens about contemporary issues. Over 40 teens and parents participated.

Ferne Kappy and Anne Jacob, JF&CS family life educators, recently facilitated the Attitudes Toward Israel sessions which explored Israeli culture, politics and Israel-Diaspora relations.

"The program really allows parents and teens to hear each other and learn how they perceive different issues," explained Jacob. "The fact that the program takes place in a person's home also makes the atmosphere more intimate and conducive to discussion," added Kappy.

Evelyn Simon attended 3 of 4 sessions with her daughter Lisa and was thankful for the opportunity to "do something together related to Judaism."

Rachel Katz, another participating parent, said the greatest thing is seeing how much the kids care. "It's so rewarding," commented BBYO's Israeli representative Zohar Raviv. "It's so nice to see adults learning from teens."

Miriam Pilc-Levine, BBYO's Senior Regional Director, plans to implement the Parent Teen Dialogue Program in other chapters to "build on its success and positive impact."

BBYO Lake Ontario Region, which includes Toronto, Ottawa, Kingston, Hamilton, Kitchener, London, Buffalo and Rochester, has 500 members belonging to 24 local chapters.

The organization is funded both through UJA Federation and money raised by the BBYO Board of Directors.

For 18 year old Amiel Blajchman, becoming a member of BBYO helped him transform from a shy, introverted teen to a leader among his peers.

"BBYO has completely changed my life," explained Blajchman, who entered the youth organization when he was in grade nine and worked his way up to president of his chapter. "BBYO truly pulled me out of my shell, and I learned to be able to deal with other people."

Making it in Israel

Aliya lures growing numbers

Ehud Savion, better known as Udi, is in the business of making dreams come true. And the dream of moving to Israel is increasingly captivating.

As the Jewish Agency's Ontario and Manitoba representative for the Israel Aliya Centre, it's Savion's job to show new olim the ropes and to prepare them for life in Israel. The Jewish Agency is funded through UJA Federation contributions.

Last year, 232 people from Savion's region made aliya - a 65% increase since 1992. This year, so far, 54 people have taken the big step. Savion credits Israel's economic growth compared to the lingering remains of the recession here for heightened interest in aliya, in addition to aggressive promotion over the past few years.

A good absorption program is the key, according to Savion, along with employment. "An oleh's employability is of great concern to me. Moving to Israel without the security of a job would be very difficult even for the most idealistic candidate."

Savion's door is always open to help potential olim find their way.

Savion stresses the demand for workers in the high-tech, tourism, and education sectors of the Israel economy. The Aliya Centre runs a variety of training and recruitment programs for new olim.

The Aliya Centre also informs olim of all the available government benefits and incentives to help new immigrants ease into their new lives. Among them are transportation to Israel, subsidized by the Jewish Agency, rent and university tuition subsidies, special mortgage rates, six months free health care and free Hebrew lessons. "The benefits are very logical because they minimize costs that would otherwise make the move very expensive," says Savion. "It's not easy to be an instant success as a new oleh so we want to do as much as possible to make things easier."

Savion and his crew at the Aliya Centre have spent the last year and half promoting the many different absorption programs throughout the community. Savion also helped to set up a community aliya committee to rally more widespread support for aliya.

"Moving to Israel can be a real culture shock," he says, "so my role is to provide olim with a reality check so they know what to expect."

Israel attracts Toronto talent

The decision to make aliya is fueled first by dreams and then a large dose of reality supplied by the Aliya Centre. Contributing editor Adi Neuberger profiles three people who are taking the large leap from dreams to aliya.

Mandy Mather, 27, left for Israel on April 17 with three suitcases, a Hebrew-English dictionary and dreams of becoming a high school English teacher. On May 1st, she will begin a one year program at teachers college in Haifa after which she's guaranteed a position in her field.

"I saw the ad for the program in the paper and I knew what I wanted to do," explained Mather, who had spent a year on a kibbutz as a volunteer before deciding to return for good. "I know I'm going to have to work hard, but I've gotten a lot of help from the Aliya Centre and support from AACI (Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel)."

Mather, who had difficulty finding a teaching position in Toronto, will receive 800 shekels a month and subsidized rent during her training. She's also entitled to free transportation from her residence in Nazareth Illit to Haifa. UJA Federation contributions will help Mather make the transition from Canada to Israel.

It's been a life long dream for South African born Jocelyn Beigel to live in Israel and now that her kids are grown, she's decided the time is right. "I have no ties here anymore and the opportunity has finally come up," said Beigel, who expects to live with her father in Netanya until she finds work and a place of her own.

Beigel went on a five week pilot trip to Israel to see if she could continue her work as a Judaic artist or as a health food caterer. "For me it's already home," she added. Beigel has started learning Hebrew and all about life in Israel, thanks to the Aliya Centre. She too knows the aliya process won't be easy but looks forward to finding her own way in a place she's always thought of as home.

Dr. Karl Skorecki moved to Kiryat Shmuel from Thornhill seven months ago with his wife and five children. "It all began two and a half years ago with a call from the Dean of the Technion University in Haifa," explained Skorecki, who heads the Department of Nephrology and Molecular Medicine at Technion Rambam Medical Centre.

"The transition went much smoother than we expected because a lot of the small details were anticipated with the help of the Aliya Centre," Skorecki said in a phone interview. The Centre was even involved in negotiating his contract with Technion.

L'hitraot. Mandy Mather drops in to the Aliya Centre's Bathurst Street offices one last time before leaving for Israel.

HOW TO MAKE IT

A STEP BY STEP GUIDE TO ALIYA

1. All potential olim must go through the Israel Aliya Centre to make arrangements, so make an appointment by calling (416) 633-4766. You'll be advised about travel, employment, financing, education, housing and the financial assistance available to olim. Olim are eligible for a loan to cover their flight to Israel on El Al. After two years in Israel, the loan becomes a grant.

2. You'll need aliya approval from the Israel Aliya Centre, which will arrange reservations at an absorption centre, at your request.

3. Check carefully about employment opportunities in your field. Even though a guaranteed job upon arrival is not always possible, it's very important to have excellent prospects before you go.

4. A pilot trip to Israel is strongly suggested. The Aliya Centre runs its own trips and it can hook you up with others as well. The pilot journey will give you a feel for business, salaries, housing, education and the realities of daily life in Israel.

5. The Law of Return is on your side. Any Jew can make aliya as long as religious identity can be proven satisfactorily.

Rabin Scholarship Fund launched in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University is launching the Yitzhak Rabin Scholarship Fund for the Advancement of Peace on May 28, with a reception at the Westin Hotel.

The evening will feature a musical tribute to Jerusalem 3000, a video message from Leah Rabin and a speech by Shira Herzog on Rabin's legacy of peace on the eve of Israeli elections.

Herzog, a columnist for The Canadian Jewish News and vice-president of the Kahanoff Foundation, is a frequent speaker and writer on the Middle East. A niece of former Israeli president Chaim Herzog and daughter of former Israeli ambassador to Canada, Baruch Herzog, she has worked as an analyst and spokesperson on Canadian Middle East policy and the Arab-Israeli conflict for the Canadian Jewish community.

Jerusalem 3000: A Tribute in Song features three Vancouver artists. The song is being provided by Lisa Kort, who has just finished a four year tour in Phantom of the Opera. She is accompanied on piano by Wendy Stuart, who arranged the music and produced a CD and cassette called Sing to Me in Yiddish. The narrator is Gerry Claman Kline, a former Winnipegger, who has worked on stage and in film.

The funds raised by this campaign will help establish the scholarship fund. Some of the money raised for the fund will go each year to support a Rabin Scholar, an internationally known researcher in peace studies, to continue studying at the Hebrew University.

The balance of the money will go towards scholarships for graduate students in areas relating to the subject of peace. At least one scholarship a year will be available for a Canadian student.

The total Canadian goal for the Rabin Fund is $2 million. Winnipeggers who donate $10,000 or more will be invited to a private luncheon with Leah Rabin in Toronto.

B.C. launches hate crimes unit

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — British Columbia is setting up a hate-crime team to help fight hate-motivated crimes arising from prejudice against identifiable groups, Attorney-General Ujjal Dosanjh has announced.

The team will consist of one full-time community liaison person, one Crown counsel, two policy analysts and two police representatives. The team will investigate the nature and scope of hate crime in British Columbia, coordinate responses to hate-crime activities, disseminate information about hate crimes and liaise with communities concerned with hate activities, said Dosanjh.

He said the government is funding a symposium of community experts to advise the team. The experts will identify priorities as well as perceived shortcomings in current responses, and recommend action to combat hate-motivated activities across the province.

The government is also ensuring police participation in information-sharing on hate-motivated activities in British Columbia and across Canada.

Anti-hate activities will include educating and promoting understanding among the province's youth by: raising awareness of recruiting tactics of hate organizations; giving parents, teachers and other caregivers the tools to prevent youth from becoming involved in hate activities; increasing caregivers' awareness of their role in recognizing and discouraging hate and bias.

Dr. Michael Elterman, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region, said he welcomed the news that "the government is initiating the first steps toward a more comprehensive approach in this complex issue."

Atlantic Jews recall war's victims

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Natan Nevo's voice broke.

"I was nine years old, I stood there [on the streets of Warsaw in October 1939] and saw the people beating three Chassidim. I turned away. I heard a shot and then saw two Chassidim standing and one on the ground. I ran home and will never forget hearing the Poles laughing, jeering and clapping."

Yom Hashoah

Nevo was speaking at Yom Hashoah ceremonies April 16 at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax. He was joined on the podium by Tom Kuttner, a law professor at the University of New Brunswick, who outlined the importance of, and read transcripts from, the Nuremberg Trials, which took place 50 years ago.

An audience of more than 150, including the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, James Kinley, his wife Grace, and several politicians, sat awe-struck, as Nevo told of being smuggled out of Warsaw to the Soviet Union on the eve of the establishment of the Warsaw Ghetto.

"We were forced to go to Siberia, another hell, but at least we were alive," he said, recalling that he lost 155 members of his immediate family in the Holocaust.

In 1946, he returned to Poland but heard the same insults as before. Early the following year, Nevo, then a teenager, gathered 145 children hidden during the war, smuggled them through Czechoslovakia to France, and travelled semi-legally to Palestine with Aliyah Aleph Bet.

"When we saw Haifa on the horizon, everyone sang Heveynu Shalom Aleichem.

In February 1948, these Holocaust survivors founded a kibbutz, "determined to build Israel," said Nevo.

Nevo fought in the War of Independence and in the 1956 Sinai Campaign, eventually moving to Paris to study at the Sorbonne. In 1965, he came to Halifax where he taught Russian language and literature for 12 years before moving to Acadia University in Wolfville, N.S., where he teaches today.

"We all lost our families but had the will to start new lives," he said of the immigrants to Palestine in 1947.

"It is now the moral obligation of every Jew to tell what happened in World War II to our children and our children's children."

As part of the Yom Hashoah ceremonies, candles were lit to remember the six million who died at German hands.

In Fredericton, an interfaith Holocaust Memorial was held April 14, with Kuttner again discussing details of the Holocaust as revealed at the Nuremberg Trials.

He encouraged people to remember that war crimes exist today. "Nations of the world must have the resolve to bring those who engage in war crimes to justice. It's a good sign that in the recent past, with both Rwanda and Bosnia, that resolve has been shown," Kuttner said.

In Saint John on Yom Hashoah, Holocaust survivor Philip Riteman of Halifax spoke at an event sponsored by the Saint John Jewish Historical Society.

Holocaust awareness program in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A name is every individual's most personal belonging. But for many of the victims of the Holocaust, even that last shred of dignity was taken from them.

Unto Every Person There is a Name is a new Holocaust awareness program, introduced by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, Midwest region, in conjunction with the Holocaust awareness committee of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, to remember by name the 4,000 to 5,000 Holocaust victims whose names grace the city's Holocaust memorial on the grounds of the Manitoba Legislature.

"Judaism constantly urges us to remember," said B'nai Brith Canada's Bert Schaffer in introducing the program which was held recently in the Manitoba Legislative Building.

The names of those listed on the memorial — as well as other names provided by the Anti-Defamation League in New York — were read out by Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate High School students, survivors and children of survivors, and members and friends of B'nai Brith Canada. In some cases, the readers were reciting the names of their own family members.

"By personalizing the individual tragedy of its victims and survivors, this international project seeks to defy dangerous trends to indifference and ignorance of recent history which are ever present in the world at large," says Sophie Tapper, regional director, B'nai Brith Canada.

"Unto Every Person There is a Name restores some dignity to those who were stripped of their identities and robbed of their lives," says Lyle Smordin, senior vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Island Yacht Club gears up for 45th year

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't let this year's depressingly long winter fool you. As sure as God made windchill factors, the weather's bound to change and that will mean heaven on earth for yachting enthusiasts.

With the boating season just around the corner, the Island Yacht Club (IYC) is gearing up for its 45th anniversary season. The season officially kicks off on June 1 with the commodore's ball, followed the next day by the colorful sail past.

However, yachters itching to get their feet wet won't have to wait that long to get their boats in the water. The two IYC tenders, which ferry members to the club on Muggs Island in Toronto's innner harbor, began their work around the end of March, said the club's commodore, Ivan Lavine.

Early April is a busy time in the club's boatyard as people get out their paint brushes and repair kits to make their boats shipshape for the summer season. Lavine, a 40-year-member of the mostly Jewish club, said he expects to have his vessel, a 36-foot sailboat that sleeps six, in the water by the third week in April.

Others in the fraternity of boaters join him later in the season, but by mid-summer the club's 180 sail and power boats should all be bobbing in their slips.

Many of the boaters enjoy "cruising" around Lake Ontario and every week a fleet of between 10 and 35 boats (up to 100 people) head off to pre-determined destinations, like Niagara on the Lake, Rochester, N.Y., and Coburg, said Elaine Leve, the club's harbormaster and an 18-year member.

Elaine Leve and Ivan Lavine

In recent years, the IYC's focus has shifted from racing to cruising as the club became more family-oriented, she said.

For many avid boaters, spending the weekend at the yacht club is an alternative to loading the family in a van and spending hours fighting traffic en route to cottage country. In much less time, club members can head down to the foot of Portland Street, just off Queen's Quay, hop onto a club tender and be transported to the dreamy setting of the yacht club, Leve said.

"It's very peaceful out there. We have all the amenities. It's like going back to live in a small town. We rely on each other and there's kindness shown," she said.

There's plenty of casual socializing and members have access to the IYC's clubhouse and restaurant, tennis courts, swimming pool, lounges, card room and snack bar, Leve pointed out.

Many boats have all the comforts of home. Lavine's for instance, once it's hooked up to the marina's power source, has hot and cold running water, a shower, a TV, a fridge, a microwave and a "head" (washroom), he said.

Lavine estimates about 150 people sleep on the their boats during summer weekends and between 30 and 50 on weekdays.

Leve spends the summer on her boat and catches a 7:30 tender to work every morning.

Those who enjoy the competitive aspect of sailing get to test their skills during the weekly Monday night club races, while those looking for a bigger challenge sign up for other Lake Ontario races.

Members are charged a $3,000 initiation fee, payable over three years, plus a membership fee of $1,750 per year, a tender charge of $250 per year and a dining room minimum of $700.

Like many other institutions in Toronto, the IYC was formed because "Jews couldn't get into other yacht clubs," Lavine said. The majority of the club's members are still Jews and many families are now introducing their children to yachting.

About 90 kids aged 8 to 16 participate in the IYC's junior program. Not only do they learn how to sail, but they race against other clubs and some participate in major competitive races, including the Canadian Olympic Raceweek Kingston (CORK).

The IYC has slightly more than 200 senior family members. At its peak about 10 years ago, there were around 250 family members, but the recession took its toll as people cut back on their boating, Lavine said.

The club is now trying to attract both sailing and non-sailing members. For more information, Leve can be reached at 924-9397 or 787-6992.

Judith Resnick: Astronaut with a dream

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

Think of some of the most unusual jobs you have ever heard of. Did you put astronaut on your list?

Some people imagine that being an astronaut means you have to be big and strong and a man, but that's not true. Judith Resnik wasn't any of these, but she became an astronaut.

From the time she was born on April 5, 1949, she wanted to know about everything and learned all kinds of things easily.

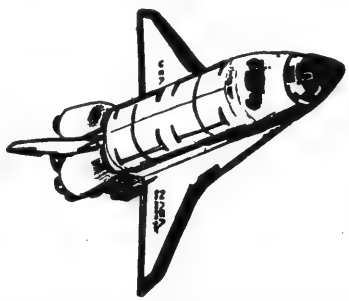
She was good enough at piano to become a concert pianist had she wanted. In high school, she was in the French and chemistry clubs. She was also the only girl to join the math club. Her score of 600 on the math scholastic tests was as high as it is possible to get. She went to religious school until her high school graduation.

Many universities wanted to have Judith as a student. She chose electrical engineering at Carnegie Mellon University, because, "It appealed to me. If I want something I want it," she said.

Her first job as an engineer was at Radio Corporation of America (RCA). At night she worked on her doctorate degree and then returned to school full time to complete her PhD in engineering.

Her next engineering job was at Xerox.

The American National Aeronautics and Space Administration program (NASA) wanted to choose six female astronauts in 1978. Eight thousand women applied.



Judith thought being an astronaut would help her career and she started running and taking flying lessons to become better than the other candidates. Can you imagine her excitement when she got into the program?

But Judith didn't like being known just because she was a woman or because she was Jewish. She wanted people to accept her as an astronaut.

She said, "We're equal in the program. I'm going because it's something I enjoy doing. NASA has some objectives in mind that I can help out with in a small way."

Being an astronaut is tough. Early in the training you learn about the electrical wiring and communication systems aboard the shuttle. An astronaut has to know how to fix everything on a ship while it is going around the world at 17,000 miles per hour with a reverse thruster and no brakes to slow it down.

Later in the training you are dropped almost straight down in an AK-135 airplane so you experience 30 seconds of weightlessness. What a sensation, plummeting through space without a parachute or a bungee cord!

Judith was always calm and professional. She said, "I think something is dangerous if you are not prepared for it and if you don't have control over it or if you can't think through how to get yourself out of a problem."

She trained at Spar Aerospace in Toronto on the remote manipulator, or remote arm, which was Canada's contribution to the space program. Talking about her, Judith's boss said, "She had a great personality, was hard working, yet she knew how to relax like the rest of us. She went after something and didn't stop until she got it."

On Aug. 30, 1984, Judith went into space for the first time, on the shuttle Discovery. The mission successfully deployed three satellites. An icicle formed on the waste outlet and the toilet wouldn't unload. Judith used the remote arm to get rid of the ice. Her crew came to be called the ice busters.

Her next mission was on the shuttle Challenger. On Jan. 29, 1986, it was all systems go.

When the crew boarded the shuttle, they didn't know the engineers had some concerns because no shuttle had launched under such cold conditions. Some of the engineers thought icicles might damage the tiles and the O-ring seals on the rocket boosters. If they had shared their concerns, a disaster might have been avoided.

At 11:39 a.m. the Challenger took off and cleared the tower. Then something happened. A jet of flame from the rocket booster started around the fuel tank. Only seconds later the tank blew up and the rocket was torn free and fell apart. All of the crew died.

Millions of people around the world watched on TV and were horrified by the terrible tragedy.

The next day, Judith's father said, "Despite what happened, I feel that the space program should continue and I know Judy would feel the same way."

After the Challenger disaster, the space program changed to make safety a higher priority. Astronauts and engineers were given more say in approving a launch; so in the end, Judith Resnik's death helped her fellow astronauts.

Trilateral medical research agreement developed

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first formal trilateral medical research agreement between Canada, Jordan and Israel was developed by a planning group that met recently in Amman.

Looking East, the document outlining the agreement, has been recommended to the respective government ministries for ratification, said Dr. Arnold Noyek, the Canadian chair of the planning committee, in his capacity as executive director of the Isabel Silverman Canada-International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO).

The other members of the group are the surgeon general of Jordan and the chief scientist for the Israel Ministry of Health.

The program is built upon the goodwill established by a scientific day held in Amman in March under CISEPO, which dealt with cancer of the head and neck, which will be the focus, at least initially, of the venture.

A major project of the program is to develop a comprehensive cancer registry that will include scientific data on cases diagnosed and/or treated in Canada, Israel and Jordan. Taking active roles in this project for Canada will be Drs. Ian Witterick and Robert Bell of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and Dr. Marty Black of the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal.

They will utilize a research program on carcinoma of the nasopharynx which has been organized by Mount Sinai's Dr. Jeremy Freeman.

The model for the registry will be developed at Mount Sinai, while the operations site will be in Amman. It will collate data from all three countries.

The agreement also calls for "workshops, fellowships and other academic and health care projects," Noyek said.

An important tool for the projects will be REMSEN, a computerized medical tool which "has the ability to conduct live information transfer and exchange between countries in the region and between the region and Canada," Noyek explained.

In addition to the focus on health care and academic medicine, the Looking East program has been designed to contribute to the overall peace process by creating person to person interaction at many levels, including involving the respective governments.

Canada, for instance, Noyek said, has traditionally been a strong supporter of the Middle East, and both Jordan and Israel are looking to draw from Canada's expertise in medicine.

Canadian government response so far has been positive, Noyek said. Officials of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade "identified Canada's strong support of the Middle East peace process and are interested in encouraging programs like this."

Noyek does not see Looking East as merely part of his job. "Our people are doing noble work," he said. "Person to person, we are part of the peace process, [with] disease being the common enemy."

A pleased and supportive Ted Freedman, president of Mount Sinai Hospital, said, "The opportunity to contribute to academic medicine as well as the peace process in the Middle East through our involvement with the CISEPO Looking East program is consistent with our vision and most welcome."

BGU faculty serves as 'model'

TORONTO — The goal of the Faculty of Health Sciences of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev is to provide a model of health services, not only for its own region, but also throughout Israel and internationally.

This assertion was made by the faculty's dean, Prof. Shraga Segal, on a whirlwind stop in Toronto recently. His visit was part of a Canadian tour, which included Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Segal called the approach of the school "revolutionary." Medicine in general, he said, is being "dehumanized, with less and less attention to the patients. We tend to treat them without consulting them, without understanding or compassion."

Ben-Gurion's opposite approach is reflected from the beginning, in the selection and training of its medical students.

"We want to train first of all a mentsh. Scholastic achievement isn't enough [for acceptance]. The applicants have to love people; they have to have shown this love by volunteer work; they must be committed to patients."

The students, he said, take the medical oath [not the Hippocratic oath, but Maimonides' prayer], not at graduation, but on the day of entrance.

"They start seeing patients on the first day. We look at them as junior colleagues," Segal said.

The faculty also trains nurses and physiotherapists and is planning to open additional schools in such fields as pharmacy, biomedical engineering, paramedics and clinical laboratory sciences.

Ben-Gurion works with directors of affiliated hospitals Barzili Hospital in Ashkelon, Yosef Tal in Eilat and Kaplan Hospital in Rehovot, to provide preventive and primary health care to the people of the Negev, "which made up 60 to 70 percent of Israel's pre-1967 borders," Segal said.

The school has been directly involved, Segal said, in consulting and treating patients in Gaza.

"We worked out [providing and organizing] courses there even in the midst of the intifada. We arranged immunization and even performed open heart surgery on 80 kids from Gaza."

Segal takes pride in the faculty's leadership in medical education all over the world.

The faculty is also involved in creating new medical schools in Kenya and Ecuador, and in a planned new medical and dental school in Moscow, which will teach in English.

"We are recognized as an official World Health Organization centre for improving medical education programs and developing primary health care systems in the Third World," Segal said. — L.S.

PNC revokes 'anti-Israel' clauses

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Palestinian National Council (PNC) voted last Wednesday to amend the PLO Covenant by 504 votes to 54, with 14 abstentions, after a short but not painless debate.

The majority was greater than predicted a few days ago and was attributed to the insistence by PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat that the PNC had no alternative but to annul the anti-Israel articles.

Arafat insisted that talks with Israel would lead to a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital and therefore refusal to change the articles made no sense, whatever difficulties Palestinians were facing at the moment.

"All revolutions end in agreements. Do you think you can get everything you want?" he said in an angry exchange with Dr. Haidar Abdel-Shafi, who headed the pre-Oslo delegation in Washington talks and is now Arafat's most serious opponent. Abdel-Shafi left the hall and voted against Arafat's proposal.

The council, with an official membership of 669, needed to amend the covenant by a two-thirds majority, or 446 votes. The actual result represented 75 percent of the members.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres expressed satisfaction with the PNC move, but said, "Look at the difficulties and sacrifices we had to endure to get to this change." He said that while he welcomed the move, there are still people among the Palestinians who are capable of "murdering the peace" and want to do so.

Connecting the PNC move with the current situation in Lebanon, Peres, speaking at a holiday gathering for ministers, foreign ambassadors and other public officials at his Tel Aviv office, said: "I am sure that just as we are currently straightening out our relations with the Palestinians, we will do the same with the Lebanese. Israel is not the enemy of the Palestinians and Lebanese, but rather the [Islamic] Jihad, Hamas and Hezbollah."

Canadian Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy welcomed the decision, "which demonstrates the commitment of the Palestinian leadership to the Middle East peace process."

The vote did not actually change the covenant, but gave authority to a PNC legal committee to do so or to draw up a completely new charter within six months. The PNC is expected to replace anti-Israel articles with a demand for a Palestinian state next to Israel.

Exactly which of the 33 articles will be changed has been left to the legal committee and could fall short of Israel's expectations.

Likud 'cautious' about move

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Not all Israeli leaders are sharing Prime Minister Shimon Peres' enthusiasm for the Palestine National Council's (PNC) decision to amend its charter.

Peres hailed last week's vote in Gaza, saying, "Maybe ideologically it is the most important change in the last 100 years."

Peres said,"The Palestinians removed all that was written in the covenant as required by Israel in the 1993 letters of mutual recognition" signed by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and then Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

But Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu played down the vote's significance.

"I would be cautious about giving unlimited credit to this step," Netanyahu said.

In its decision, the PNC did not adopt a new covenant, but appointed a legal committee to draw one up. The new document is not expected to be completed for several months.

The Israeli group PeaceWatch, which monitors implementation of the Israeli-Palestinian peace accords by both sides, also said the PNC decision fell short of what was required by those agreements.

"The PNC did not actually amend the covenant, but instead approved in principle that changes would be made, without specifying which clauses would be changed, in what manner or by what date," the group said in a statement.

In legal terms, "there is a sharp difference between calling for something to change and actually implementing the changes," Peace Watch added.

Meanwhile, Hamas, which violently opposes the peace process, said it would continue its armed struggle.

In a statement issued by the Hamas spokesperson in Amman, Jordan, the militant Islamic group said many Palestinians still adhere to the original, 32-year-old covenant.

PEACE NOW

"Terrorism is an attack on the peace process, not a result. It did not start with the Oslo Accords. Attacks by Hezbollah started in 1982 and the PLO mounted attacks against Israelis from 1968 and through the 1970s & 1980s. If peace talks fail, the terrorists will be empowered to advance their ultimate aim - the end of the Jewish state."
Tzali Reshef - Peace Now spokesperson.

WE FULLY SUPPORT THE GOVERNMENT OF ISRAEL'S EFFORTS TO FIGHT TERRORISM AND SUSTAIN THE PEACE PROCESS

These efforts are tough yet pragmatic on both the Palestinian and Lebanese fronts:

NO to further withdrawals from the West Bank and Gaza until the Palestinian Authority demonstrates, to the satisfaction of the Israeli government, its commitment to severely punish terrorist leaders, supporters and institutions which recruit, train, equip and fund suicide bombers.

NO to moving forward with the peace process with the Palestinians unless they amend the Palestinian Charter by May 7. (By the time this ad is printed, the Palestinians may have already dealt with this issue.)

NO to any withdrawal of Israeli troops from the buffer zone in southern Lebanon until an effective settlement is in place which includes the complete cessation of Hezbollah activities against Israel.

and...YES to continuing the peace process.

ONLY A POLITICAL SOLUTION CAN END THE SPIRAL OF BLOODY VIOLENCE AND LEAD TO TERRITORIAL COMPROMISE AND PEACEFUL CO-EXISTENCE BETWEEN ISRAEL AND ITS ARAB NEIGHBOURS.

Momentous week in Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

By any yardstick, it was a momentous week in the Middle East.

•A ceasefire, brokered by the United States, ended 16 days of fighting in southern Lebanon and northern Israel.

Mideast Analysis

•The Palestine National Council voted to delete all references in its national covenant to Israel's destruction and armed struggle.

•The Labor party, led by Prime Minister Shimon Peres, dropped its formal opposition to a Palestinian state and declared that the Golan Heights are no longer essential to Israel's security.

On April 26, following a week of intense shuttle diplomacy which took him to Israel, Syria and Lebanon, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher finally announced a truce which stopped the cross-border violence. Without the use of ground troops, Israel was unable to stop the Katyusha launchings by military means alone.

The parties to the ceasefire are Israel, Lebanon and, indirectly, Syria. Neither Hezbollah nor its chief patron and arms supplier, Iran, were directly involved in the protracted negotiations, which may not augur well for the future.

The latest round of fighting began on April 11, when Israel launched Operation Grapes of Wrath to silence Hezbollah's Katyusha launchers, scattered among the Shi'ite villages of Lebanon's southern region.

The ostensible purpose of Israel's air, land and naval bombardment of Beirut and southern Lebanon was to force Syria and its protectorate, Lebanon, to end Hezbollah's reign of terror, which caused widespread property damage in the Galilee but, miraculously, no deaths. By all accounts, Hezbollah fired about 700 rockets into Israel, more than the combined total launched by the PLO and Hezbollah between 1968 and 1995.

The written, though unsigned, understanding which brought the strife to a close, for now at least, is remarkably similar to a 1993 document which prompted Israel to call off its week-long Operation Accountability. That informal agreement, which broke down in late March and early April, was also arranged by the United States.

Like the 1993 accord, the new understanding forbids Israel and Hezbollah to fire on civilians and enjoins the antagonists to confine their military activities to Israel's self-declared security zone. This is a small strip of land in southern Lebanon adjacent to the Israeli border which Hezbollah has sought to wrest away from Israel.

Israel established the enclave in 1985 to better protect its northern frontier, but the Israeli army and its surrogate Arab force — the South Lebanon Army — have occupied the area since Israel's 1978 invasion of Lebanon (Operation Litani).

The newest understanding is anything but a victory for Israel, since the status quo ante in virtually every respect has been restored. Peres had said he would not accept an agreement that merely returned conditions which prevailed before Operation Grapes of Wrath. But with the notable exception of a clause in which Hezbollah promises not to operate from populated centres, the agreement, for all practical purposes, is a mirror image of the 1993 understanding.

Hezbollah has not been disarmed, nor has Syria offered guarantees that it will restrain Hezbollah or cut off the flow of weaponry to its band of fighters. Syria, with 35,000 troops in Lebanon, controls Hezbollah's supply routes in Lebanon, and uses Hezbollah as a lever with which to apply pressure on Israel on another front, the Golan Heights.

Nearly two months ago, Peres suspended Israel's bilateral talks with Syria over the Golan, saying they would not be resumed until Damascus reins in Hezbollah. Neither the Syrians nor the Lebanese authorities have promised to defang Hezbollah, whose prestige rose as Israel bombarded Lebanon — the real loser in the conflict.

Theoretically, then, a replay of last month's fighting cannot be ruled out in the future. Yitzhak Rabin, in his last interview, warned that Israeli soldiers would continue to die in southern Lebanon until Israel and Syria sign a peace treaty. It is a prophecy worth remembering.

Two days before the ceasefire in Lebanon and the Galilee went into effect, the Palestine National Council — the Palestinian parliament-in-exile — voted by a substantial margin to revoke articles in its covenant that are at odds with the PLO's peace agreements with Israel.

The decision — fulfilling a promise made by the PLO in 1993 when it signed the Declaration of Principles in conjunction with Israel — capped a historic political process which began in 1988 when the PLO accepted Israel's existence and renounced terrorism.

Israel and the PLO will now proceed to final status talks, which are scheduled to start later this week. And, in keeping with the Oslo 2 agreement, the Israeli army will make preparations for a partial withdrawal from Hebron.

The Labor party's complementary decision to jettison clauses in its official platform which rejects a Palestinian state and deems the Golan as vital to Israel's security represents a sea change in Israeli policy.

It means that the PLO can look forward to a Palestinian state should the final status negotiations be successful, and it sends an important signal to Syria, whose readiness for a full-fledged peace treaty with Israel nevertheless remains a question mark.

Palestinian state hinted at in Labor platform

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israel's Labor party has approved a platform that no longer rules out the creation of a Palestinian state.

Voting last Thursday to change the party's 1992 platform, which expressly opposed Palestinian statehood, party members also withdrew a 1992 plank that the Golan Heights is crucial for Israel's security, even in a time of peace.

But the Golan regional council head, Yehuda Walman, succeeded in passing an alternative clause stating that Labor recognizes the Golan as an area of "national importance."

At the same time, dovish minister Yossi Beilin failed in an effort to replace a clause declaring the Jewish settlements in the Jordan River Valley crucial to Israel's security with a more generally worded statement.

Labor's decision to alter its position on Palestinian statehood came a day after the Palestine National Council (PNC) voted overwhelmingly to revoke the anti-Israel portions of its charter.

Labor's move was welcomed by the U.S. State Department and by Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who told the 669-member PNC, "This is the first reaction to your decision yesterday from the other party."

Canada would favor the creation of a Palestinian state if the security of Israel was to be guaranteed, Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy said of the change.

The PNC reportedly ended its latest session by electing Arafat president of the 18-member executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

For the first time, the committee will include five members from the West Bank, Gaza Strip and eastern Jerusalem.

Faisal Husseini, the PLO's top official in Jerusalem, was among those elected to the committee.

The Week in Israel

April 22

• IDF Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak appointed Chief Artillery Officer Brig.-Gen. Dan Harel to head an investigatory committee to examine the circumstances that led to the inadvertent shelling of the UNIFIL compound near Cana in southern Lebanon.

• Ha'aretz reported that Bank of Israel governor Prof. Jacob Frenkel raised interest rates by 0.78 percent, in order to achieve the inflation target set by the government.

April 23, Yom Hazikaron

• A two-minute memorial siren brought Israel to a standstill at 11:00 a.m., as people refrained from all activity to silently recall the country's fallen soldiers.

• The IDF stated that 18,211 soldiers have fallen in the the line of duty since the War of Independence. In the past year, 177 soldiers lost their lives.

April 24, Yom Ha'atzmaut

• Ma'ariv reported that Oded Eran, deputy director of the economics department in the Foreign Ministry, has been slated to become the next ambassador to he United Nations.

April 25

• Yediot Aharonot reported that Prime Minister Shimon Peres warned Iran, via French diplomatic sources, that Israel will retaliate against targets in Iran, if Jews or Israelis abroad are singled out as targets for terrorist acts.

April 26

• Yediot Aharonot reported the IDF will begin its redeployment in Hebron on May 5. After redeployment, 85 percent of the city will be under Palestinian jurisdiction; 15 percent of the city, including 15,000 Palestinians and 500 Israelis, will be under Israeli protection.

Canadian professor vying for Knesset seat

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV – When Henry (Zvi) Weinberg left Toronto four years ago, he never thought he'd end up running for Knesset. But the ex-professor from the University of Toronto may soon be the only MK with a Canadian passport.

Weinberg, who immigrated to Israel in 1992, was recently elected to the sixth spot of Israel ba'Aliya, the new political party headed by former Prisoner of Zion Nathan Sharansky. Public opinion polls predict the party will get at least five or six seats in the May 29 election.

"I was as surprised as anyone to do so well in the party primaries," admits the 60-year-old professor of French literature, who teaches at Bar-Ilan University.

While Weinberg may be a newcomer to Israeli politics, he is not a new face to Russian immigrants. Before moving to Israel, he spent some 25 years as a Soviet Jewry activist, travelling to the U.S.S.R. to lecture on behalf of the Canadian Committee for Soviet Jewry.

He was particularly involved in a campaign to free former Prisoner of Zion Yuli Edelstein, who after his release visited Toronto to thank Canadian activists. That is where the two first met. When Weinberg fulfilled his lifelong dream of making aliyah in 1992, Edelstein – who is number 2 on the party list – invited him to join the working committee of Israel ba'Aliya.

The ex-Torontonian was the only non-Russian on the 25-member committee and has been active in the movement ever since, addressing Russian audiences in what has become nearly fluent Russian. (Weinberg studied Russian literature at university, but began speaking the language only when he moved to Israel.)

When the movement became a political party, its leaders urged Weinberg to run in the party primaries. He did and beat some well-known Russian figures.

"I think I'm seen as someone who can articulate the Russian immigrant cause beyond Russian circles," explains Weinberg, who has campaigned in Hebrew, English and Russian, and hopes to mobilize support from North American immigrants in particular.

"I see this as a continuation of my 25-year struggle for Soviet Jewry. After encouraging Russian Jews to come to Israel, I feel a moral duty to help them," he says. "Hundreds of thousands of them are in trouble. The stories are legendary. Writers, engineers and other highly trained people are sweeping the streets. They work at menial jobs if they have a job at all. And they feel unwanted and humiliated by the way they are portrayed in the media," he says, noting the frequent references to Russians as criminals or prostitutes. (The rate is no higher among these immigrants than it is among any other group, he maintains.)

Although Weinberg repeatedly refers to Israel ba'Aliya as "a Russian party," he insists that it cannot be dismissed as an ethnic lobby group.

"Aliyah is not a narrow, ethnic goal; it's a national goal of primary importance. There is only one realistic reservoir of aliyah now – and that's Russia. Whether another million Jews arrive from Russia will depend on how Israel is able to absorb those already here," he says.

Weinberg warns that the prospect of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians returning as part of a final peace accord only underscores the importance of aliyah. "Demography is the lifeline of this country."

Weinberg, who was born in Krakow, Poland, but grew up in the United States, is not a complete novice at politics. In addition to writing extensively on political topics, he was an advisor to French President Francois Mitterrand and campaigned for Senator Robert Kennedy in his bid for the presidency in 1968. In fact, Weinberg – who lived in the United States for 30 years before moving to Canada in 1969 – says he was 10 yards away from Kennedy when he was shot.

But he would never have become involved in Israeli politics, he says, if not to help Russian immigrants. "Becoming a Member of Knesset was never my lifelong ambition," says the balding professor who has a copy of Flaubert's L'education Sentimentale on his desk. "I would not have contemplated politics; I have a profession."

If elected, he says his first priority would be funding retraining and housing programs to help Russian immigrants in the 45 to 65 age group.

"They are the most tragic cases, because they have established professions, but have difficulty learning Hebrew and are often doomed to work in menial jobs for the rest of their working life."

An observant Jew who lives in Jerusalem, Weinberg says he sees no conflict between his own beliefs and the party platform, which calls for civil marriage, secular burial and public transportation on the Sabbath. These clauses squarely address the secular nature of the Russian immigration and the fact that many of the immigrants are not considered to be Jewish according to the Rabbinate.

"The kind of solutions we will seek will alleviate hardship without insulting traditional Jewish views," says Weinberg. When pressed on these issues, however, he is vague. How can an observant Jew support civil marriage in Israel?

Weinberg admits that the solution is not one he would condone for his own family. "I wouldn't want my grandchild to marry a Russian immigrant whom the Rabbinate regards as a non-Jew," he says. "It's a problem, but when you're observant you want to make sure that marriage is within the fold."

What about non-Orthodox conversion? "That's another problem," he says. "I think a middle road is possible, but I can't give specific examples."

He expresses no such ambivalence regarding the party's security platform, which he says faithfully reflects his own views: no Palestinian state; insistence that Palestinians fulfil their obligations under the Oslo accord; and linking territorial concessions on the Golan with moderation of the Syrian regime.

The May 29 election is the first in which Israeli voters will fill out two ballots, one for a party and one for a prime minister. Israel be'Aliya leaders are not endorsing one prime ministerial candidate or another.

Israel to get laser defences

If such a system is settled on, it would be operated by Israelis, Bacon added.

The administration intends to commit to spending $50 million for Nautilus development over the next three fiscal years, with Israel contributing $20 million, Bacon said.

The first Nautilus test was conducted earlier this year in New Mexico.

Bacon said work on Nautilus deployment may proceed simultaneouslywith the development phase, but this is not certain. The Pentagon will soon approach Congress for funding, he added.

The developments, as well as Secretary of State Warren Christopher's brokering of the ceasefire arrangement last week, are "opening a new road on the way to peace" and are an effort to "stop the attempt to stop it," Peres said.

He also said that the arrangement paves the the way for resuming negotiations with Syria.

Peres said he feels confident the truce in Lebanon will hold.

"It is holding. I believe it can hold on," he said at Blair House, the government guest house across Pennsylvania Avenue from the White House.

"The next step will be the renewal of negotiations with the Palestinians, opening the last and third stage of the negotiations for a permanent solution."

Perry also told reporters the United States takes seriously Iran's possession of short-range ballistic missiles that "already pose a threat" to Israel, and believes Iran is trying to develop long-range ballistic missiles.

Ceasefire reached in Lebanon

The U.S.-brokered ceasefire understanding reached last Friday between Israel and Lebanon includes the following:

• Armed groups in Lebanon will not carry out attacks using Katyusha rockets – or any other kind of weapon – on Israel.

• Israel and those cooperating with it will not fire any kind of weapon at civilians or civilian targets in Lebanon.

• Beyond this, the two parties commit to ensuring that under no circumstances will civilians be the target of attack, and that civilian-populated areas and industrial and electrical installations will not be used as launching grounds for attacks.

• Without violating this understanding, nothing therein shall preclude any party from exercising the right of self-defence.

A group consisting of the United States, France, Syria, Lebanon and Israel will monitor the application of the agreement.

The understanding also recognizes that a comprehensive peace in the region can be achieved only on the basis of negotiations between Israel and Lebanon and Israel and Syria, and that such negotiations can only occur in an atmosphere of calm and stability.

Bankers' claims questioned

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK - The Swiss Bankers Association, facing an official inquiry regarding what became of Jewish assets from the Holocaust era deposited in Swiss banks, told a U.S. Senate committee last week that the bankers are dedicated to resolving the questions about the dormant Jewish accounts.

"Let me assure you that, at the end of the day, not one penny that could have belonged to victims of the Holocaust will be held by Swiss banks," said Hans Baer, chairman of Bank Julius Baer and a member of the executive board of the Swiss Bankers Association.

The bankers are "committed to resolving all outstanding questions about these accounts in a sensitive, equitable, open, accurate and professional manner," said Baer, a Swiss Jew whose family had fled to the United States during the war, fearing the Nazis would overrun Switzerland.

The Swiss association, which has 405 member banks, said that as of Jan. 31 it had identified about $32 million (US) in 775 dormant accounts in 36 banks.

The amount, and the methods for determining it, has long been disputed by Jewish groups.

It "defies credibility," said Edgar Bronfman, head of the World Jewish Restitution Organization. The amount, he told the committee, may be closer to "several billion."

In many ways, the hearing was more cathartic than climactic. For months there has been a spate of publicity about the Swiss banks, with what often seemed like daily revelations of, at best, miscalculation, or at worst, malfeasance.

Much of the publicity comes from newly unearthed archival or U.S. intelligence documents. One item, for example, showed that in 1946 one Swiss financial institution alone had deposits currently worth $29 million from primarily Jewish sources. Another suggests that two of Switzerland's top banks -- Credit Suisse and Union Bank of Switzerland -- continued doing business with the Nazis after Swiss banking rules barred such dealings.

The Jewish contention that the Swiss banks are holding more in assets than they claim is not new, nor was Baer's announcement that an independent commission will be authorized to make a final determination regarding the assets of Holocaust victims.

However, observers were pleased that the United States expressed its commitment to press Switzerland for a full accounting of the funds and to ensure that survivors recover their money. Where heirs cannot be found, said Undersecretary of Commerce Stuart Eizenstat, the United States will try to ensure that funds "are distributed in the fairest way possible to benefit those who suffered the most during World War II."

"It isn't enough for the Swiss banks to say they only have $32 million available to settle this dispute and not provide an accounting," said Senator Alfonse D'Amato of New York, the committee chair. "There is more. There has to be."

Six Swiss banks function in the United States, employing 6,000 people, and they paid more than $100 million in U.S. taxes in 1994, Baer told the committee.

This is the second review of Swiss accounts in more than 30 years. In 1962, the Swiss banks determined that they held 9.5 million Swiss francs belonging to victims of Nazi persecution, which by 1973 was returned to heirs and given to a domestic refugee-aid organization and the Jewish community.

"On the one hand, we are being asked to explain why there are any assets left at all," Baer said, referring to the 1962 determination, "and on the other hand, we are being asked why there are so little assets left."

Seen in context, he said, the amount is neither small nor surprising. Although the amount will change as the banks refine their figures, Baer said, "it is highly unlikely that they will dramatically decrease or increase."

Solidarity for Yaroslavl Jews

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

YAROSLAVL, RUSSIA – The bombing of a Jewish community centre here has drawn sharp condemnations from local officials, including the regional police chief, who termed the attack a "crime against the state."

As police investigated the bombing of the centre, Jews from the 2,500-member community gathered in larger numbers than usual for Shabbat services the day after the attack in a show of solidarity.

The explosion in Yaroslavl came during the same week that a Jewish centre in Smolensk was robbed and daubed with anti-Semitic graffiti.

An explosive charge equivalent to more than two pounds of TNT was used in the Yaroslavl attack, a police spokesperson said.

Parts of the 80-year-old building housing the community centre suffered serious damage as a result of the explosion, which caused no injuries.

"Dozens of people, many of them just neighbors, came to help us with cleaning up the place," said Inna Davidova, director of the Hesed Charitable Society and member of the community's executive board.

Davidova said she was surprised by the larger than usual turnout for services on Saturday, with some people attending for the first time since the synagogue was reopened two years ago.

"People wanted to express their solidarity," Davidova said.

All 60 students of the centre's Jewish Sunday school came to class Sunday, said school director Nadezhda Nosova.

She said that no more than 40 children usually come to school each Sunday.

"But last Sunday was a different case," she added.

The chief rabbi of Russia, Adolph Shayevich, who visited Yaroslavl, spoke of the grave concerns such incidents raise within the Russian Jewish community.

"Today most Russian Jews are those who would prefer to stay here," said Shayevich. "But every such act emotionally disturbs the Jewish community."

Two Jewish families are leaving Yaroslavl each month, with most of them going to Israel.

Leaders of the community said they would not be surprised if this number soon increased.

The community centre is located in a synagogue that was built in 1916. In 1934, the building was confiscated by local Communist authorities. The Jewish community recovered the property in 1994.

Along with a synagogue, the centre houses local organizations that serve the needs of the Jewish community in Yaroslavl, located about 130 miles northeast of Moscow.

The explosion, caused by a bomb planted outside the centre, shattered all the windows in the building and in some neighboring houses.

An office of the Hesed society and a room that served as the community library suffered the worst damage.

Investigators said they believed that the explosion was merely an act of hooliganism.

But community leader Isaac Davidov said he has asked the investigators not to ignore the fact that Yaroslavl has a community of several dozen Lebanese and Syrian college students.

Davidov said that even though he had no evidence, he believed that some of the students might have wanted to attack local Jews after the April 18 shelling by Israeli forces of a UN base in southern Lebanon.

Jewish leaders said the bombing had caused $12,000 (US) worth of damages.

Yaroslavl city administrators allocated $2,000 to the community. The Russian Jewish Congress is expected to provide the remainder of funds needed to repair the building.

Carpathian town, Cuba, Holocaust focus of films

Sheldon Kirshner previews several of the movies to be shown at the fourth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, running from May 2 to 9.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Once, before the unspeakable horrors of the Holocaust, a pious, though impoverished, Jewish community flourished in the Carpathian Mountains.

In his elegiac documentary, Carpati (May 7), Yale Strom travels through parts of this remote region formerly under the sway of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and the Soviet Union but now in Ukraine.

His guide is Zev Goldinger, one of the last remaining Jews in the town of Beregovo, a kind of melting pot where ethnic Ukrainians, Russians, Hungarians, Jews and Gypsies coexist.

Goldinger, an ice cream vendor before his retirement, is the caretaker of the local synagogue, as well as the Jewish community's gravedigger.

During the course of Carpati, narrated by Leonard Nimoy, Goldinger — a likeable figure whom some refer to as "Uncle Zev" — drops in on dingy cafes where Gypsy fiddlers play lively klezmer music, chats with aquaintances and neighbors about the past, visits a fellow Jew in Beregovo, reflects on anti-Semitism and brings a donated Torah to his boyhood shul in nearby Vinogradov.

Goldinger is glum about the future. "You'll need a candle to find a Jew here in 10 or 15 years," he observes, in a comment that seems extremely apt.

Less than a year before the outbreak of World War II, 9,300 children from Germany, Austria, Poland and Czechoslovakia, the majority of whom were Jewish, arrived in Britain, having been sent there by their parents for safekeeping. The children, aged five to 17, were placed in Jewish and Quaker homes. In most cases, they never saw their mothers and fathers again.

Mellissa Hacker's documentary, My Knees Were Jumping: Remembering the Kindertransports (May 8), tells their story through archival footage, photographs and on-camera interviews.

The focus is on Hacker's mother, the late Ruth Morley, who was uprooted from her home in Austria at the age of 13. But the film, which at times is poignant, moves beyond Morley's experiences and explores the lives of her contemporaries and that of their children, both at a reunion in upstate New York and elsewhere.

As My Knees Were Jumping unfolds, we learn that all the refugees expected their parents to join them, that some placements were more successful than others, and that the U.S. Congress killed a bill to admit such children.

It is gratifying to know that this film cemented Hacker's relationship with her mother. Previously loath to discuss her childhood years, Ruth Morley unburdened herself of her memories just before dying of breast cancer.

Laura Paull's evocative Havana Nagila: The Jews of Cuba (May 5) is a documentary well worth seeing. Advertised as the first cinematic history of Cuban Jewry, Havana Nagila takes the story up to the present day.

Until the 1880s, Jews were not permitted to live on the island. But with the loosening of restrictions, thousands of European and Turkish Jews settled in Cuba.

Paull explodes the myth perpetuated by the St. Louis incident in 1937 that Cuba was hostile to Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi persecution. From the late 1930s until 1942, Cuba admitted 8,000 Jews, more than any other country in the Western hemisphere relative to its population.

But, as a series of interviews with Cubans reveal, Cuban society was riddled with racism and anti-Semitism.

By the early 1950s, the generally affluent Jewish community, with 15,000 souls, reached its peak. Some Jews fought with Fidel Castro's forces, but 90 percent — none too happy with Communism — emigrated, leaving behind the assimilated and the poor. Indeed, two Jews were appointed to Castro's first cabinet in 1959.

While Castro demonstrated respect for Jews as a people and tolerated private Jewish schools, Cuba broke relations with Israel in 1973. Paull claims that Israel's alliance with the United States influenced Castro's decision.

Paull, whose sympathy for the Cuban revolution permeates her narrative, argues that Jewish life was revitalized in 1991 when the ban on religious observance was lifted. Cuba's estimated 1,200 Jews are free to practise Judaism, but the U.S. economic boycott, supported by Israel, has squeezed all Cubans.

In passing, Paull praises the efforts of the Canadian Jewish Congress in supplying the Cuban community with food and religious articles.

You, Me and Jerusalem (May 5) is an antidote to all those terrible television images of splattered flesh, bone and blood following a Hamas suicide bombing. The film, co-directed by an Israeli and a

The emphasis is on Jewish and Arab Magen David Adom ambulance paramedics who work together, sometimes under very difficult circumstances. Yet the most interesting portraits in this episodic documentary are of two newspaper distributors, an Arab and a Jew, who have been friends for decades.

Yiddishland Cafe: Well-known cabaret performer Beth Anne Cole, singer-comedian Stella Walker, actor Harvey Atkin, guitarist Brian Katz, folksinger Alan Merovitz and the klezmer band Chutzpah are set to open the new Yiddishland Cafe, 471 Lawrence Ave. W., on May 11, 8:30 p.m.

Producer and co-MC Hindy Nosek-Abelson says the cafe will present monthly programs and provide a venue where professional entertainers may perform works in Yiddish.

"You don't have to speak it to love it," she says. "I believe that Yiddishland will become a local hangout, a kind of Queen Street north, where professional musicians and artists can explore their heritage as well as create new Yiddish works."

Adults, $10 in advance, $12 at the door. Tickets available at Lasting Impressions One Hour Photo, Bathurst Manor Plaza. Or phone 416-783-5919 or 416-633-4212.

Battle of the Bookstores: Earlier this year, the U.S.-based mega-bookstore chain Borders was denied federal approval to open a branch in Toronto, apparently because it did not fulfil the government's cultural ownership policy. However, Toronto entertainment lawyer Michael Levine – acting for the three Canadian investors Heather Reisman, Edward Borins and Michael Bregman – has suggested that the deal may not be dead.

"I think you can read between the lines and get a feel for what's going on," Levine recently told Quill & Quire, the journal of Canada's literary trade, adding that he couldn't say more at that time.

Quill & Quire reported Edward Borins has been trying to sell or seek investors for his bookstore chain, Edward's Books & Art, which peddles remaindered books. Evidently, fewer remainders would be available for independent stores like Edwards if any of the U.S.-based superchains expanded into Canada.

Jolson Coming to Toronto: The Olivier Award-winning hit musical Jolson: The Musical, now playing in London's West End and reviewed glowingly in this column recently, is slated to play here in June and July 1997.

David and Ed Mirvish, proprietors of the Royal Alexandra Threatre on King Street West, recently announced that Jolson: The Musical will form part of the 1996/97 subscription season, along with the plays Jane Eyre, Death Of A Salesman and The Glass Menagerie.

The musical, which the London Daily Mail said is "worth walking a million miles to see," has opulent sets, a 42-member company, and a pre-production budget of $8 million. Season subscriptions start at $75. 416-593-4225.

In Brief: The Yorkminstrels present the musical Gypsy at the Leah Posluns Theatre, North York, May 4 to May 12. Attendees are asked to bring canned goods for the North York Harvest Food Bank. For showtimes and ticket prices, phone 416-620-6608.

New York-based guitarist Mordy Ferber and Toronto guitarist-composer Brian Katz present an evening of mostly original compositions May 8 at Mezzetta Cafe Restaurant, 681 St, Clair Ave. W., (at Christie), Toronto. Katz and Alan Merovitz perform Hartzedike-Lider, May 29. 416- 658-5687.

Elise Goldman, a 22-year-old student in York University's theatre studies program, has been hired to head the drama program this summer at Tyler Hill Camp in Pennsylvania. A resident of Thornhill, Goldman previously worked six summers as part of the music and drama staff for Robin Hood Day Camp, north of Toronto.

Toronto singer-actor Theresa Tova was born in Paris sometime in the 1950s. Incorrect information appeared in an earlier column.

Financial analyst blazes trail for other women

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Self-described fitness fanatic Sherry Cooper doesn't let her demanding career as senior vice-president and chief economist of Nesbitt Burns stand in the way of her exercise routine. It's not uncommon to see the trim 45-year-old scanning the Financial Times of London while she goes through an energetic workout on the Stairmaster.

With over 300 speaking engagements on her yearly calendar, many of them out of town, she says her daily workouts of 60 to 90 minutes are a necessity.

"To me giving a speech is physically exhausting. I'm sweating at the end of it. To do three or four in a day, you have to be fit. I know, because I wasn't very fit. I realized it about 10 years ago."

Cooper's mental workouts are as intense as her physical ones. She leads a team of economists who analyze and predict financial and economic variables like interest rates, inflation and unemployment rates for Canada and the United States in a global context. She is actively involved in policy analysis and consults regularly with provincial and federal governmental bodies.

On a typical morning at the First Canadian Place offices of Canada's largest investment dealer — a result of the 1994 merger of Nesbitt Thomson and Burns Fry — Cooper will hold four briefing sessions between 7:30 and 8:45.

Her daily reading material includes five newspapers — the Globe and Mail, Financial Post, Wall Street Journal, New York Times and Investors' Business Daily.

"It's a research job. I'm constantly studying," Cooper said in a recent interview.

The result is a prolific output of written economic analyses, along with television and radio appearances to comment on economic issues.

Cooper is optimistic about Canada's economic future, but she cautions baby boomers to plan carefully for old age.

"We have to save for our retirement, and we better save a lot. Interest rates are down. It takes more capital to generate the same interest stream. We sure can't depend on government; so we have to be quite frugal, and I think it's happening."

She doesn't foresee widescale poverty or massive drains on the health care system as her generation ages. "We're more health conscious than any generation before us. We're looking very carefully at investments and analyzing the potential for further savings. That's not to say everyone will live like kings. People will probably work longer. I think people will want to be active into their 70s."

As a health care consumer, she likes the notion of extra billing for those who can afford it. "When the price of something is zero, there will be excess demand and abuse of the system."

Cooper, a native of Baltimore who lived in the United States until 13 years ago, sees major differences between Canada and the United Staes. "In the U.S., profit is not a dirty word. Canada is much more small-'s' socialist. The mentality is very different."

Before she moved here 13 years ago, Cooper expected Toronto to be similar to American cities. Instead, everything from the Canadian constitution to our plastic milk bags has taken getting used to.

Cooper believes it is essential that Canada eliminate budget deficits and begin to pay down debts. "That will help spur economic growth."

As an undergraduate student at Baltimore's all-women Goucher College, Cooper didn't really know what economics meant, she says now. Her interest in the subject was sparked by a course she took because it fit into her schedule.

She graduated first in her class in 1972, majoring in math and economics, before going on to earn her master's and PhD degrees at the University of Pittsburgh.

Cooper still loves economics. "It is highly methodological but it's also intuitive. I love it ... The content of my job — what I'm analyzing — changes hour to hour. Every cycle is different. No two days are ever the same."

The daughter of a lawyer and a stay-at-home mother, Cooper didn't realize until she entered "a hotbed of women's liberation" at university that she could pursue a non-traditional career.

A trailblazer for women in the financial world, Cooper got her early experience at the Federal National Mortgage Association and the Federal National Reserve Board in Washington, D.C. She became the first female chief economist in Canada in 1983 and the first woman director at Burns Fry. From 1989 to 1993 she co-headed the company's global fixed income department, directing worldwide sales and trading of bonds, money market securities and securitized finance.

While there are far more women in the business now, she said, including some in the executive ranks, women are still "clearly a minority."

Of course, men treat her differently, she said, but "for every disadvantage there's an advantage."

A believer in equal opportunity for women, she does not favor giving women any advantages over men.

Six years ago, she became a founding member of INNET, a networking group of about 50 women at the top of their fields who meet monthly. "For me it's a way to have peers. We have no mission. We enjoy each other's company. That's not to say we don't help each other careerwise — we do."

Married to consultant Peter Cooper, with a teenaged son from a previous marriage, Cooper sometimes struggles to balance family and work commitments. (She also serves on Temple Sinai's board of directors and executive committee.) She marked her son's school play on her calendar six months in advance to ensure she wouldn't be out of town.

Cooper believes the participation of women in the labor force has peaked in North America, as more women are deciding it's not worth the price. "Some choose not to have kids. Some choose to stay home when their kids are young, and are willing to sacrifice economically."

When Cooper's son was born in 1980, she took only four months off. "We would have felt we were selling out if we stayed home [longer]," she said of women who began their careers in the 1970s.

In a report issued last November entitled Sex and the Economy: the Next Revolution, Cooper noted that an excess of marriageable young men relative to women has resulted in increased birth rates and numbers of traditional families (father working, mother at home with the children) in recent years.

"We're seeing a real pendulum swing back," she said. "I think it's much more positive today. Women feel they truly have a choice."

Mother's Day

Success is no accident for Al Gilbert

Recently, Al Gilbert donated original portraits of Yitzhak Rabin, taken 10 years ago, to all donors who attended Mrs. Rabin's speech in Toronto. Along with the portrait is a calligraphy of Rabin's last speech. The calligraphy was created by Laura Silver, which was also donated. "It is a priceless memento," says Gilbert. Recently, he was commissioned to take Mrs. Leah Rabin's portrait during her visit to Toronto.

Gilbert's photographs are prominent in a permanent collection, dating back to the early 1900s housed at Baycrest Centre. The collection includes individual portraits of every Prime Minister of Israel, dating from David Ben-Gurion to Shimon Peres. One of the portraits of Levi Eshkol was used for an Israeli stamp.

The Baycrest Centre also displays an historical collection of the Jewish community in Toronto dating back to the early 1900's.

To Gilbert, however, success is no accident. "Reaching a level of excellence requires the experience of a series of achievements. These help raise the photographer to higher and higher plateaus," he says.

In business since 1950 when his father, photographer Nathan Gilbert opened a studio for him on College Street, Gilbert boasts an almost endless list of credits recognizing him for his photographic achievements. Often called the Ambassador of Canadian Photography, he is recognized nationally and internationally for his unique style and has established himself as one of Canada's finest photographic artists.

He has been voted Photographer of the Year three times by the Professional Photographers of Canada and holds a Canadian Master of Photographic Arts degree as well as its fellowship. In addition, he has earned the Master of Photography, Photographic Craftsmen degrees and fellowships with the Professional Photographers of America, the Royal Photographic Society of Great Britain and the British Institute.

As well, he is a Member of the Order of Canada, holds the Confederate Medal of Canada and in 1994, was awarded the Lifetime Achievement Award by the Photographic Industry of America, and the International Award from the American Society of Photographers.

He remembers with fondness the early days of his career. "The war was just over and I took pictures of returning soldiers and displayed them in the window. The Jewish population congregated on College Street at that time, and the pictures were a hit. I was influenced by Hollywood photographers and used spotlighting instead of the usual window lighting. With spotlighting I was able to create glamorous and dramatic images of veterans, brides – anyone I photographed."

He cites his education in commercial arts as one of the biggest boons to his success. "This helped me to see light, reflections and to pose subjects and enabled me to analyze the features of subjects, choose the proper angles and select the correct lenses. However, a photographer must learn to wait before exposing the image, for that specific moment when the subject expresses a look that is appealing to him personally. That look is intended to evoke a particular response from the audience. I believe that a photographer photographs his feelings."

Photographic talent aside, Gilbert also attributes the success of his career to a keen interest in public relations projects. "I realized very early in my career that talent alone wasn't enough when it came to capturing the attention of the public. The secret was to capitalize on my interests and hobbies, thereby incorporating a personal involvement in each project."

In 1950 he began photographing such musical greats as Cab Calloway, Duke Ellington, Dizzy Gillespie, Kay Star, Oscar Peterson, Eddie Fisher and Frank Sinatra, all had appeared in Toronto as part of a local radio station's promotion. Listeners who called the station were rewarded with a picture postcard of their favorite singers.

When a local radio station, just a few years ago, began featuring big band era music Gilbert approached them with the offer of trading original photographs of Frank Sinatra for free advertising. The success was immediate and there were over 1500 requests for that photograph. " A promotion of 30 years ago is still bringing in dividends," he says.

Today, Gilbert Studios has kept up with the changing styles in photography by involving the 3rd and 4th generation of Gilberts. Art photography has been Michael's specialty. Nina is creative with her advice and selection of props and backgrounds. Gail offers advice for framing services to our customers. Darren has recently begun to integrate computer manipulation with photographs that demand a unique flair. Both Dawn and Darren offer location photography for children, engagement portraits, pets and weekend portrait sittings in the studio. They enjoy photographing clients with a distinct '90s look. Al Gilbert continues with his traditional style of portraiture which is always in demand and never out of fashion.

Why it makes sense to buy outdoor furniture from a specialist

Patio and casual furniture are important investments that should enhance your home, deliver comfort, pleasure and timeless good looks for many years.

Smart shoppers have learned they can save time and money by buying from a specialist like Deck & Dock. Here's why:

Selection: Deck & Dock offers a broad selection of every type and style of casual furniture at a full range of prices – furniture that is almost never available to discount chains. Each is made by a quality manufacturer who stands behind his product.

Knowledge: Deck & Dock's sales staff are professionals trained by the manufacturers. They know the features, benefits and quality of every piece of furniture they sell.

Customizing: You can select the color, style and fabric that you prefer even if it's not displayed. You are not limited to what they have in stock. Deck & Dock will special order the combination you like best and have it manufactured for you.

Service: Deck & Dock takes pride in the outstanding service it provides to its customers. Business grows when satisfied clients tell their friends how delighted they were with the service.

Assurance: Deck & Dock stands behind what it sells. Should a problem ever arise, Deck & Dock will take care of it for you so you will not be left on your own to deal long-distance with the manufacturer as other mass merchants do.

Pleasant Experience: Shopping for an important product should be a pleasant experience. You will be treated with dignity and respect – the old fashioned way – making your selection in a beautiful setting of fully accessorized sets. The store's goal is to help you arrive at the choice of merchandise that best meets your needs.

Value: Deck & Dock operates in a highly competitive market and offers excellent value at every price level. You will find Deck & Dock's prices extremely attractive, particularly when you consider the added service, advice and continuing back up that you receive.

Time: You can decorate your outdoor space over a few years if you like. Buy a dining group and some chaises this summer. Add a glider and extra chairs next season. Deck & Dock makes sure you select merchandise likely to be available year after year so you can add to it. Or the store will suggest ways to coordinate solids, stripes and florals to add variety.

Deck & Dock is located at 1280 Castlefield Avenue, Toronto. (416) 781-4887.

UV rays also have positive effects for your skin, too!!

We all have read or heard about how bad the sun is for your skin. The media have always been influenced by companies with high advertising budgets. Large cosmetic companies (we all know) who produce bronzers and self tanners spend hefty amounts on advertising them in fashion magazines, TV, radio, etc.

The hysteria the media has created about the sun's rays is completely overstated. Many recent studies have shown how the sun can be beneficial to people suffering from fatigue, psoriasis, SAD (winter blues) and not also to mention the huge psychological and physiological advantages. This brings us to Heliotherapy, the positive effects of the sun I recently discovered during my investigations at Toronto's most authoritative indoor tanning chain CLUB TAN. With 6 locations it seems people are coming back to tanning in large numbers in the Toronto area as salons such as CLUB TAN really feel it is important to educate their clients.

When I chatted with owner Marshall Gottlieb, he informed me that since there isn't any regulatory body governing salons in Canada, he said it is very necessary to choose the right salon where they have the best and most up to date equipment as the industry is constantly evolving with safer beds. Marshall comforted me in letting me know his salons have the latest in safety and equipment using tanning beds that are fully climate controlled within a controlled environment. I witnessed a large 16 minute bed as well as facial tanners and this unique stand-up styled tanning capsule. I don't know about you, but when it comes to my body, I wanted to make sure I used the best salon out there as you can't really put a price on safety of your health. They prescribed a professional tanning schedule for the time before and after my vacation right through the summer according to the condition of my skin, objectives and budget. With more than $1 million invested into knowing their business, it is no wonder they are a successful and growing company for years to come.

Thanks to Marshall and his informative staff.

Israelis are in a buoyant mood

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV – The national mood-o-meter on Israel's 48th Independence Day showed a reading of optimism and good cheer that seem to defy history, if not reality.

Commentary

Only five months ago, in the aftermath of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the country appeared divided by a deep, dark and unbridgeable chasm. Two months ago, a series of suicide bombings appeared to open a new and unstoppable reign of terror. Last week a promising military operation against Hezbollah turned horridly sour with a single misplaced artillery bombardment. Yet the mood-o-meter, despite several smart smacks to check whether the gauge is stuck, persisted in reflecting a sense of buoyancy.

The navy and air force, booked for Lebanon this year, failed to show up for their annual display along the coast. But the public on the Tel Aviv beachfront found ready solace in beach chairs and in the cafes where coffee is modishly served in cups the size of soup tureens.

Inland, picnickers lazed about in family tableaus, seemingly unaware they are in the Middle East, not Minneapolis or Middlesex.

One factor in the sense of quiet contentment is the secular liturgy Israel has devised over the years to celebrate itself – events redolent with meaning and good taste.

The transition ceremony on Mount Herzl between Memorial Day and Independence Day, in particular, succeeds in projecting a sense of purpose and unity with both military flair and the authentic voice of those in the front line of nation building.

Likewise, the people we see interviewed on television during these two days, particularly the bereaved, project a dignity and depth that is uplifting.

Another soothing factor is the current political scene. While the divide opened up by the assassination is indeed deep and dark and probably unbridgeable, it has become clear that it is not down the centre, but along a narrow edge. If the left is now accusing the right of having stolen its peace slogan and if the main campaign issue shaping up is peace with strength or strength with peace, we are talking not about a divided nation but about a nation sharing a broad political consensus.

The most important factor in the nation's upbeat mood, however, is the nation itself, a reservoir of energies and communal will with few parallels. Stiffened by tragedy and buoyed by purpose, it has been performing its high-wire act for close to half a century – absorbing immigrants, battling enemies, kvetching, building, remembering always where it has come from, sharing a vague sense of the direction in which it wants to go.

On its beach chairs and picnic blankets last Wednesday, Israel took vengeance on its enemies.

Jewish groups 'outraged' at release of former Nazi guard

By HEATHER CAMLOT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – Jewish groups reacted to the release from prison this week of a former Nazi concentration camp guard because she is ill.

We are expressing "revulsion and outrage at this development," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress.

In 1981, a German court in Dusseldorf found Hermine Ryan, a guard at the Majdanek concentration camp in Poland, guilty of murder and sentenced her to life in prison.

Some 200,000 people, including about 70,000 Jews, died at Majdanek.

Ryan, whose maiden name was Braunsteiner, had fled to the United States after the war and married an American. In 1975, she was extradited to Germany.

Ryan, now 76, was released last Sunday from the prison hospital where she had been since 1990.

According to German law, after a prisoner has served 15 years, the court must examine whether there are any grounds for parole.

The release of former Nazis on grounds of illness is "all too common an occurrence," said Steinberg, who did, however, add, "As brutal as she was, she should receive medical attention."

HERB CAPLAN SELLS SUB-ZERO
1111 Weston Road [illegible] 767-1655 FOR LESS

MIXED BERRY TORTE

2 3-oz pkgs soft ladyfingers, split
6 tblsp raspberry liqueur or juice
1 pint lemon sherbet, softened
1 pint lime sherbet, softened
1 pint frozen yogurt (any berry flavour)
2 1/2-pint baskets raspberries
1 1-pint basket blueberries
1 1/2-pint basket blackberries or berries in season
fresh mint sprigs

Trim ladyfingers to fit sides and bottom of 9" springform pan. Brush cut sides of ladyfingers with half of liqueur. Fit ladyfingers in bottom and up sides of pan. Layer lemon sherbet, lime sherbet, and frozen yogurt in pan. Smooth top and freeze 4 hours or overnight. Place all berries in large bowl. Add remaining liqueur and toss to coat. Pile berries on top of torte. Release and remove pan sides. Transfer to platter. Garnish with fresh mint and serve. Serves 8.

About people

Dear Ella,

A friend of mine recently shared a story about her daughter with me and I can't seem to get it out of my mind.

It seems that her class at school was doing a unit on the holidays, and the teacher had decided as one of the lessons to teach the kids how to make charoset.

My friend's daughter has an allergy to nuts. The teacher sent home a note explaining that as part of their Passover unit they would be making charoset, but that Linda (her daughter) would be sent to another classroom to avoid any possible contact with nuts, thus preserving her safety.

My very first reaction to this was the teacher was being very conscientious and cautious for the benefit of Linda's well being. The more I thought about it however, the more I thought this poor kid not only can't participate in a fun activity with her class, but her allergy to nuts has forced her to learn to deal with being made an outcast as well.

This whole incident didn't sit right with me. I wasn't sure whether or not to say anything to my friend.

Ella, what do you think about this story? Have I blown this all out of proportion?

Nuts to them

Dear nuts to them,

A teacher has a clear duty and responsibility for the safety of a child. If nuts were going to be used in the classroom, then obviously Linda should be nowhere near them, however I seem to feel that this teacher missed an opportunity to teach a far greater lesson.

She was so concerned for Linda's safety that she didn't see the forest for the trees so to speak.

What a great opportunity to incorporate a lesson on acceptance, tolerance and understanding of other children.

Although the traditional recipe for charoset contains nuts, there are other recipes available without them. (The Passover Gourmet by Nira Rousso). They could have made a recipe without nuts and maybe been handed out a copy of the recipe they are doing along with a copy of the traditional one, accompanied by an explanation of why they are making a recipe without nuts.

Linda is different from the other kids because of her food allergy and she will always have to be on guard as will the people responsible for her.

There are always ways around things and I'm sure if the mother had explained her position to the teacher things may have been different. This could have been a good lesson for everyone all around.

Conflict over Hebron

By BATSHEVA TSUR & JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's Prime Minister Shimon Peres does not intend to allow the Jewish community in Hebron to expand its presence in the city.

"There will be no changes in the status quo in Hebron, and I will not allow additions to buildings," Peres told the cabinet last Sunday.

He was responding to a demand from Environment Minister Yossi Sarid that the government make political decisions about the future of Hebron.

The cabinet or the security cabinet will discuss the issue some time next week, Peres said.

"The prime minister discusses things with the army, and decides alone. There is no government, no cabinet and no ministerial team negotiating with the Palestinians," Sarid charged, demanding that the withdrawal take place now, not after the elections.

"The impression is that the government gives in to pressure and worse – to threats ... from settlers, orchestrated by [Likud MK] Ariel Sharon and [former Kach activist] Baruch Marzel," Sarid added.

"This is not true. The government will stand by its commitment to the Olso accords," Peres reportedly replied.

The redeployment will be coordinated with the Palestinians, he added, saying Foreign Ministry Director-General Uri Savir would meet with Palestinian Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), and OC Central Command Maj. – Gen. Uzi Dayan would discuss the situation with the Palestinian Authority police chief.

Israel is also keeping in touch with the Palestinians over the deployment of the international peacekeeping force, he said.

The overriding factor in the decision not to withdraw before the elections, has been security, Peres stressed. There have been repeated warnings of impending terrorist attacks.

General Security Service head Ami Ayalon, however, discounted a report in the daily Hebrew paper Ma'ariv that some half a dozen suicide bombers are already inside Israeli territory waiting to act.

Security sources added later in the day that there is no factual evidence to back up the Ma'ariv report. They said that some of those identified in the report are in the Gaza Strip or are being held by the Palestinian Police.

Meanwhile, Peres has distributed copies of the official English text of the Palestine National Council's (PNC) resolutions on the Palestinian Covenant, sent to him by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, to the cabinet.

Describing it as an "historic resolution," Arafat wrote to Peres in an accompanying letter that "the [covenant] is hereby amended

A bridge between communities

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The bitterness between the secular and religious elements of Israeli life has lessened considerably since the police report on the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin concluded that "not one rabbi, either acting [pulpit] or educational, was involved in any way," says Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Israel Meir Lau.

Rabbi Lau, who was in Canada on a tour sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress, spoke to the media in a brief interview sandwiched between a meeting with the Toronto Vaad Harabanim and a visit to the Holocaust Memorial at Earl Bales Park.

He "condemned" the authorities for "bringing rabbis [to the police stations] like murderers, with TV and news media."

While he refused to comment on political or military matters, he said that he suggested the government "take a second thought about the Israeli army abandoning Hebron." He said that he would bring this concern to Prime Minister Shimon Peres on his return to Israel.

The rabbi said he saw his role as building a bridge between the Jews in Israel and those in the Diaspora, and "encouraging Jewish identification through Jewish education.

"You can understand my concern when in a city like New York, only 12 1/2 percent of children get any Jewish education and there is an intermarriage rate of 52 percent." If every Jewish child received even a bit of Jewish education, he said, "the map of Jewish survival would be changed."

The leadership must get its priorities in order, he said, to attract and recompense the best teachers possible.

Rabbi Lau gave a major address earlier in the week to a large crowd at Beth Avraham Yosef Congregation, where he spoke about the singular importance to Jews of the holy city of Jerusalem.

Rabbi Israel Meir Lau

"Do Muslims pray facing Jerusalem? Has the Pope ever set up his chair there even when the Christians ruled the city?"

Only Jews pray facing Jerusalem from wherever in the world they are. "Three times a day we include Jerusalem in our prayers. Four days during the year we fast for it; three weeks we mourn for it. Even under the chupah we break a glass for it. The Pesach seder and Yom Kippur service end with 'Next year in Jerusalem.'"

When the young soldiers touched the stones of the Kotel for the first time in 1967, "they didn't come like it was for the first time. They came like someone who returns, because the tears of their parents, and the blood of the soldiers were

Candlelight Vigil Held

VANCOUVER – A candlelight vigil for victims of hate crimes was held recently in the pouring rain at Vancouver's art gallery. It was sponsored by the Affiliation of Multicultural Societies and Service Agencies, which includes the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Alan Rose Fund

MONTREAL – The Alan Rose Fund for International Human Dignity established in memory of CJC's former executive vice-president will hold its first event on May 14 in Montreal.

Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy will be the keynote speaker on The New State of Arab-Israel Relations in Light of the Middle East Peace Process: A Canadian Perspective.

JIRS Goes Toll-Free

MONTREAL – If you are outside Montreal and want some information about the Jewish community in this city or elsewhere, it's now as simple as picking up the telephone and dialing toll-free 1-888-CJA-JIRS (1-888-252-5477).

The number, accessible from anywhere in Quebec and Ontario, will connect you with Jewish Information Referral Service, the one-stop shop for Jewish community information.

ISRAEL

Wolf Prize in Medicine

HERZLIA – The 1995-96 Wolf Prize in Medicine was presented last month in Jerusalem to Dr. Stanley B. Prusiner of the University of California, San Francisco, for discovering the "prions' which cause mad cow disease. The prions are a new class of pathogens that cause neurodegenerative diseases such as Creutzfeld-Jakob in humans and scrapie and BSE in farm animals through changes in protein structure.

Jewish Website Launched

JERUSALEM – The Virtual City of Jerusalem will be inaugurated on May 17, to coincide with Jerusalem Day.

This website will allow visitors to explore information within the city and to benefit from a number of features, including online chat sessions, study classes and a complete vacation guide with a listing of hotels in Israel.

The site can be reached at http://www.virtual.co.il.

NIF Campaign Levels Up

JERUSALEM – In a year when the campaigns of many Jewish philanthropies either declined or remained flat, contributions to the New Israel Fund in 1995 reached $10.6 million, surpassing last year by 15 percent.

The New Israel Fund also announced that it would award 90 grants totalling more than $2.8 million, to Israeli groups.

Food Conference

JERUSALEM – Officials from more than 40 countries convened last week in Tel Aviv for a five-day international conference on food and agriculture.

Finding ways to combat world hunger was a central topic of the conference.

WORLD

Reports Denied

BUENOS AIRES – Reports that a squad of Hezbollah suicide bombers were found on Paraguay's border with Argentina have been denied by authorities of both countries.

Despite the denials, the so-called "triangle area" in northeastern Argentina, on the border with Brazil and Paraguay, was placed on alert after intelligence reports claimed that 20 suicide bombers had arrived in Paraguay from the Middle East.

Syrian Terrorism

WASHINGTON – As the United States and Syria prepare to work together to monitor Hezbollah terrorist activity in Lebanon, the State Department has once again placed Syria on its list of countries that sponsor international terrorism.

Jewish Cemetery Marred

BUDAPEST – Anti-Semitic graffiti and slogans were painted on graves recently at the Central Jewish Cemetery on the outskirts of Budapest.

In addition to the swastikas and Stars of David on the graves, some 15 tombstones were overturned on the night of April 22.

Hungarian police said their investigation had not yet turned up any suspects.

Lion of Judah

NEW YORK – Jewish women from around the world will convene in October for the first-ever United Jewish Appeal National Women's Campaign International Lion of Judah Conference in Jerusalem.

Grants Offered

NEW YORK – The Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany has announced that grants are available for Jewish institutions and organizations that provide shelter and social care to elderly Holocaust survivors.

Lubavitch Prayer Book

BUDAPEST – For the first time in more than 60 years, a Jewish prayer book has been published in the Hungarian language.

The siddur, printed in Hebrew and Hungarian, was given an initial press run of 10,000 copies by the Lubavitch Jewish Heritage Centre.

Jewish Studies Institute

VIENNA – A university in Slovakia has announced plans to open an institute for Jewish studies.

The institute, which will be part of the academic program at Comenius University in the Slovakian capital of Bratislava, will hold its first sessions in September.

Jerusalem One of Poorest Israeli Cities: Study

JERUSALEM – Jerusalem's population is becoming poorer, as well as more fervently Orthodox, according to a report on the capital released last week.

The report, prepared by the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, found that 33.9 percent of the children in Jerusalem lived below the poverty line in 1994, compared with the 22.8 percent national figure.

The report also described Jerusalem as one of the poorest cities in the country, with the 1993 average monthly wage totalling about $1,200, as compared with $1,400 in Tel Aviv and $1,470 in Haifa.

'Reality' begins to sink in following Calgary letter bomb

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press'

CALGARY — The day after a parcel bomb shook the Jewish community, life was back to normal at the Calgary Jewish Centre.

Children played happily in the daycare, aerobics classes were full and seniors roamed the building. However, for many staff at the centre the reality of what had happened was just beginning to sink in.

"This was the real thing — this wasn't a bomb threat," said Joel Miller, executive director of the Calgary Jewish Centre and Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC). "We all think it can't happen here, but the lesson is that it can happen anywhere."

To recap what happened: At approximately 9:50 a.m. on April 29, Tove, the secretary in the Jewish National Fund (JNF) office, opened a gift-wrapped package that had arrived by mail the Friday before.

"I opened it and it went boom! with lots of powder. Adela [Boltec] and Aron [Eichler] came running and we realized a bomb had just exploded," Tove recounted. (Boltec and Eichler work in the office of State of Israel Bonds adjacent to Tove's.)

Tove was in shock, but Eichler ran to have the police notified. Within minutes the bomb squad was on the scene. The second floor was evacuated, but police concluded that there was no danger of a second explosion and the rest of the building remained open.

From the initial investigation, police ascertained that the detonating device had gone off, but the bomb itself had not exploded. And Tove was not hurt.

Jewish centres increase security precautions

CJN Staff

Responding to a letter bomb that partially exploded at the Calgary Jewish Centre last week, community officials in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver have increased security precautions.

At the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) in Toronto, metal detectors have been installed for the first time ever in the mail room.

"Luckily, all our mail is delivered to one point and we'll retain that system," said Deborah Pinsky, BJC executive director.

The centre has called in a security firm and will consider any recommendations on restricting access, said Jim Emery, BJC senior manager.

Pinsky and Emery explained that the centre is open to members and non-members from 6 a.m. to ll p.m and that the many doors and exits complicate the problem.

Control desk

Asking members to show their cards before entering the building is not being contemplated at the moment, Pinsky said.

However, as before, members must show their cards at a control desk before using any facilities.

"We have had meetings with staff following the Calgary incident and impressed on them the need for heightened awareness of any gym bags that are left alone in the lobby or other areas," she said.

The use of restricted buzzer systems on some doors and of video cameras will be considered in the light of the security firm's report, she said.

Closing off the centre's rear doors would pose a hardship for disabled members who have no other access to the elevators to take them to the athletic and other facilities, Emery said.

In Montreal, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada sent a joint letter to community institutions advising them to be "more vigilant, especially in relation to suspicious packages from unknown origins."

The community security coordinating committee of the two organizations, which brings together representatives of synagogues, schools and other institutions, met with Montreal Urban Community police after Israel's bombing of south Lebanon, to ask for increased surveillance of Jewish buildings here, said CJC Quebec region director Jack Jedwab.

Jebwab said there were no incidents "worth reporting" recently, but it is widely known that there was a bomb threat two weeks ago at the YM-YWHA.

Jebwab is satisfied the police take the community's concerns seriously and are taking "all possible steps ... to maximize" the security of Jewish institutions.

Community agencies in the Jewish Community Centre of Vancouver are also taking extra precautions in opening their mail.

A meeting of agency directors was called by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, immediately after it received news of the Calgary scare, and each director was instructed to take special care, especially with parcels from unidentified sources.

The Jewish National Fund (JNF), which was the target in Calgary, often gets large packages of printed material and other supplies and is probably more at risk than other agencies.

Brig.-Gen. Itchak Fuchs, the JNF shaliach, told The CJN in Vancouver that he has received input from headquarters in Montreal and Israel on techniques to detect dangerous packages. "We're being extra careful," he said.

Trying our best to prevent mistakes

In the rhythm and the rush of putting out a weekly newspaper, we occasionally make mistakes. It is a testament to the character of our readers and the earnestness with which they pore over their CJN that our mistakes are invariably noticed and drawn to our attention.

Generally speaking, the mistakes are of two kinds. I will call them "invisible" and "visible." An example of an invisible mistake is an editorial decision which results in our "missing" a story. This usually arises in one of two ways. We simply fail to assign someone to cover a newsworthy event for reasons other than shortage of staff. Or, due to lack of space in the paper, we decide to omit one story, already filed and on hand, in favor of a different story which subsequently proves to be of lesser news significance than the one we have omitted. These mistakes are "invisible" because they are apparent to the discerning reader despite their absence, or invisibility.

The more common mistake is the "visible" one. This is the mistake which is usually apparent to even a casual reader and more often than not "leaps" off the page – except to me and to my staff in those very busy, quickly-moving few hours on Monday morning before deadline.

There are three kinds of "visible" mistakes. The easiest to identify is the writing mistake such as incorrect spelling, incorrect grammar, sometimes even lines that are dropped or misplaced.

The second type of visible mistake is, simply, a mistake of fact which occasionally creeps into the newspaper. For example, recently, one of our monthly columnists wrote that a dozen people lost their lives in the bombing of the Jewish community institution in Argentina. This, of course, was factually incorrect. The number killed was well over 100.

The third kind of visible mistake is factual inconsistency between a headline and the story to which it relates. This is the rarest of all mistakes. Unfortunately however, it has occurred twice in the last month.

In our Passover issue, on April 3, we featured a front page story by Sheldon Kirshner on the subject of a "mysterious" speech which Yasser Arafat was alleged to have made to a gathering of Arab diplomats in Stockholm, in which he purported to lay bare the blueprint of a plan for the elimination of Israel through the Oslo peace process. The headline over the story on the front page was Tracking down Arafat's "speech." It accurately reflected the content of the story.

The problematic headline appeared on the page on which the story was continued. It read: Contents of Arafat speech denied by all. This headline was incorrect. In fact, as the story made clear, the speech was not denied by all. It was denied by most, but not by all. Indeed one of the commentators mentioned in the story who did not deny the contents of the speech was Ehud Ya'ari, a prominent Israeli writer. At the most, the headline could have only read and should have only read: Contents of Arafat speech unverified.

The second instance of headline inconsistency occurred in last week's issue over the article dealing with the meeting by the PLO to revoke their charter provisions calling for the destruction of Israel.

The headline was: PNC revokes "anti-Israel" clauses. Even though this was similar to the headline carried in virtually all the newspapers in Israel, it was not an accurate reflection of the story to which it related. As the story itself indicated, "the vote did not actually change the covenant, but gave authority to a PNC committee to do so within six months." Thus, a more accurate headline might have been: PNC commits to revoke "anti-Israel" clauses, or PNC agrees to revoke "anti-Israel" clauses.

The fact that both of the occurrences dealt with Yasser Arafat-related stories was an unfortunate coincidence. It merely added grist to the grinding mill of those readers who are skeptically wary of the peace process and who criticized The CJN for publishing Kirshner's story in the first place, attributing to the paper unfounded and untrue motives of PLO apologetics for doing so.

Our readers should also know that the reporter who writes the story almost never writes the headline.

We are dedicated to the highest journalistic standards possible in The CJN. Credibility is a newspaper's most precious hallmark. Without accuracy, it will have no credibility. Thus, we spare no effort to ensure accuracy. We try very hard to make the right decisions to prevent the invisible mistakes and to perfect our systems and lines of responsibility to catch the visible ones before they are irreversibly committed to print. This is our commitment to the reader, whose loyalty to The CJN is the very reason that we publish. It is also our commitment to the paper itself, its history, its traditions and its mandate. All mistakes are preventable, but unfortunately, not all of them are prevented.

The editor, of course, is responsible and accountable for them all.

shed together on those same stones."

Rabbi Lau described his giving a Hebrew/French Bible to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien earlier that day. "I told him that the word Jerusalem appears 587 times in Tanach. That shows the centrality of Jerusalem as the eternal capital of Israel."

Jews all over the world, he said, must convince each other of Jerusalem's significance before they can convince the Christian world and "our neighbours" of it.

An emotional break in the tour was a short stop at the Holocaust memorial at Earl Bales Park in North York. Rabbi Lau, who had asked to see the monument, spoke with sculptor Ernest Rabb. Then, against the backdrop of fading flowers, facing the names of the camps he himself had been in, along with Mizrachi executive director Rabbi Menachem Gopin and Holocaust survivors, he recited Kaddish and K'El Maleh Rachamim.

Kalejs linked to killing unit

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Konrads Kalejs' name can be found on a number of wartime documents showing he was a member of the notorious Arajs Kommando (AK) during the time the unit participated in the murders of tens of thousands of Latvian Jews, an immigration adjudicator was told last week.

In one document, submitted in November 1941 to the University of Riga, Viktors Arajs, who headed the pro-Nazi police unit, attests that "1st Lieut. Kalejs has been a member of the Latvian Auxiliary Security Police (AK) from July 29 to the present."

Another document, submitted by the deputy chief of the AK in November 1942, attests that Kalejs "has been in the service of the Latvian Security Section since July 30, 1941 and was at the eastern front between Feb. 14, 1942 and April 27, 1942."

A third document confirmed that Kalejs was on a list of men who were entitled to receive cigaret rations in 1944 after the AK was incorporated into the Latvian Security Police Battalion (the Latvian Legion).

A fourth document records 1st Lieut. Kalejs receiving a DM 290 monthly salary from October 1943 to December 1944 as a member of the Legion.

Yet another document introduced last week was a copy of an April 10, 1942 article by Kalejs that appeared in a Latvian magazine that describes the eve of battle against Russian partisans.

The Arajs Kommando consisted of volunteers who participated in a pogrom that claimed 400 lives in the Riga ghetto and the liquidation of the ghetto, and who later guarded the area where thousands of civilians were shot, said historian Konrad Kwiet, an expert witness on the Holocaust.

Almost the entire complement of the AK participated in the liquidation of the ghetto, as well as cordoning off and guarding the killing sites while members of the German Einsatzgruppe (mobile killing squad) murdered about 30,000 Jews, Kwiet testified.

That took place over several days at the end of November and early December 1941, he added.

In March 1942, the Arajs Kommando, along with German forces, attacked a Latvian village, killed more than 90 inhabitants and burned it to the ground.

"This had nothing to do with war conducted under international law," Kwiet testified.

Kwiet testified that the AK also formed a reservoir of volunteers who served at Salaspils, a forced labor camp 17 kilometres from Riga, as well as being seconded to German security units in White Russia.

He agreed with a finding by a U.S. Court of Appeal that "outside of Latvia, usually in Russia, the AK followed the German SS in so-called anti-partisan activities which were little more than a cover for the arresting and murdering of civilians."

In 1993, the court ordered Kalejs, a citizen of Australia, deported from the United States for serving with mobile killing units.

Kalejs eventually took up residence in Toronto, moving into a North York condominium that also has a number of Jewish residents, including Holocaust survivors.

At the hearing last week, Win Thompson, Kalejs' immigration consultant, said Kalejs "wants to clear his name."

As the media surrounded him after the first day of hearings, Kalejs attempted to shield his face from photographers while saying only, "You're very stupid, all of you."

Outside the hearing room, about 25 of Kalejs' neighbors watched proceedings on a closed-circuit TV. One of Kalejs' neighbors, Vera Peter, a Holocaust survivor, said, "I wanted to make the statement that he's not welcome in Canada and not in the building in which I live."

Concerns expressed over new health bill

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's proposed Bill 26, designed to provide medical care for underserviced communities, has implications for Jewish doctors.

In order to prevent new doctors from congregating in what the Tory government considers overserviced areas like Toronto, it is suggesting that OHIP numbers (through which doctors are paid on a fee-for-service basis) be given only to those who establish practices in small communities, such as Red Lake, Kapuskasing and Sudbury.

Some Jewish interns and residents are strongly opposed to the proposed legislation. Cliff Posel, a resident in psychiatry at the University of Toronto, came to The CJN with his concerns.

"There are issues here specific to Jews," he said, such as the availability of synagogues, kosher food, Jewish schools. "For a Jew, living without any other Jews is very difficult."

There is no thought being given to such problems as ensuring guaranteed time off for Rosh Hashanah and Passover, let alone for Shabbat, Posel charged.

Posel is also opposed to forcing people to go to remote communities. "They will just stay as long as they have to and then leave. What good is that?"

Tariq Asmi, special policy assistant to Health Minister Jim Wilson said the government hopes to encourage doctors to go to underserviced areas voluntarily through such incentives as practice support, access to locums, continuing education guarantees, direct contract payment rather than fees-for-service, specialist backup and referral, and better pay for emergency services.

"Only if we have to, will we go the OHIP number route, and then we would look to introduce bases of exemption, such as humanitarian considerations.

"We realize that there are things integral to one's [religious] faith. We hope that the measures we propose will be enough to encourage phyicians to move on a voluntary basis."

Steve Tishler, past president of the Professional Association of Interns and Residents of Ontario (PAIRO) and a cardiology resident at the Toronto Hospital, is skeptical about the government's methods and about its insistence that this year's graduating class fill the service needs.

"The government is giving us only one year to solve a problem that has been going on for decades. "Such a short time-line is doomed to failure. They have to give it time to work."

Calling the relocation policy "completely unfair," Tishler, himself Jewish, said that "it is more than a freedom of practice issue. Jews would be culturally isolated."

PAIRO believes the government has not given sufficient assistance to physicians who choose to practise in underserviced areas.

The organization has proposed such additional supports as computer networks, increased benefits and more ability to communicate with specialists.

"We feel that offering appropriate packages will help recruit and retain medical personnel. Not only will it be more effective, but it will avoid forcing people to practise where it will be a major problem for them," Tishler said.

"We are completely opposed to billing number restrictions."

Society's medical needs paramount: expert

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Under Jewish law (Halachah) it is more important to meet the overall needs of a society than to address the medical needs of one individual, even if it costs a life, an Israeli expert said here recently.

Owing to limited health resources, debate is underway on how best to share those that are available, said Dr. Avraham Steinberg, Hebrew University, Jerusalem. All the institutional needs of a community must be considered, not just its health needs, he said.

Asked how this applied to Ontario, Steinberg said, "Halachically, Premier [Mike] Harris is entitled to make decisions. Whether it is the right decision, I don't know. I don't have an answer for the minister of health.

When introducing the speaker, Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, said, "I hope and pray that Premier Harris will not be successful in all his endeavors."

In the opinion of Steinberg, who has consulted on medical issues with Israel's Chief Rabbinate, the time has not yet arrived for critical decisions in Israel or Canada on how to allot medical resources. Up to now, the issues in the debate have been "exaggerated," he believes.

However, he said much money is being wasted, citing the $10,000 cost for an MRI (Magnetic Resonance Imaging) and CAT scan for a child who has a headache. "This is not necessary if a good history is taken," said Steinberg, who is head of child neurology at Hadassah Medical school.

Studies have shown, he said, that only one-tenth as many investigational tests are carried out in England as in the United States, but the outcome is the same.

He also cited unwarranted costs involving decisions on whether to pull the plug on life support systems and on malpractice insurance.

Steinberg said he was concerned that in the effort to cope with limited medical resources, physicians would be given incentives to save money and thus would neglect "the dying, the demented and the elderly."

The Jewish viewpoint, he said, is to avoid extreme positions on issues such as abortion and the terminally ill and to follow the precepts of Maimonides in judging case by case.

He spoke under the auspices of the Association of Jewish Chaplains of Ontario and the continuing education committee of Beth Emeth.

In thanking the speaker, and referring to his Toronto lectures, assistant Rabbi Barry Schneider said, "There is a tendency in the Jewish community to say, carte blanche, that [organ] donations are not allowed, but the situation is more complicated than that."

IRB accepting fewer Israel refugee claims

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's repeated messages to Canada that the Jewish state does not produce refugees may finally be getting through.

Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) last year granted asylum to 121 claimants from Israel, almost all of them said to be originally from the former Soviet Union. It's the lowest total since 1992.

The IRB heard 569 claims from Israel in 1995 and denied asylum to 319 claimants. A further 1,745 cases from Israel are pending.

The numbers stand in stark contrast to 1994, when the board accepted a record 380 refugees from Israel, more than in the previous five years combined.

The national acceptance rate of refugees from Israel dropped from 50 percent in 1994 to 21 percent last year.

The latest figures may go some way toward patching up a long-standing spat between Jerusalem and Ottawa.

Since 1989, when the first wave of emigration from the Soviet Union took place, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to springboard to this country.

Typically, former Soviets allege that in Israel, they were harassed, persecuted, denied jobs and even beaten and raped because of their mixed marriages and questionable status as Jews.

Israel says their claims are spurious.

The issue boiled over in 1994, when Jerusalem publicly called on Ottawa to stop accepting the claimants, arguing that ex-Soviets were using the Jewish state as a stepping stone to the West.

An education seminar on the Law of Return and how Israel treats newcomers was held in Montreal.

But Canada, in effect, told Israel to mind its own business, and continued accepting the claimants.

The bulk of last year's claims were made in Montreal, where historically, IRB panels have been less favorable to Israel.

In 1994, Montreal IRB panels accepted about 75 percent of claims from Israel. But last year, Montreal's rate fell, to mirror the national average of 21 percent.

Eli Yerushalmi, Israel's acting ambassador to Canada, told The CJN he is "pleased" the numbers are down, "but not pleased that there's even one case from Israel.

"This has to be completely gone from the agenda," he said, adding that he believes Israel's message is being received.

Perry Romberg, acting national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), attributed the overall decline to more and better information about Israel flowing to the IRB.

"The good news is [the acceptance rate] is coming down. The bad news is, it's still too high."

Sri Lanka, Somalia and Iran topped the IRB's list of source countries for refugees last year. Israel was sandwiched between Ukraine (129 refugees) and Romania (120).

Experience Israel's Most Phenomenal Musical Talent

Noa
(Achinoam Nini) and Gil Dor

live in concert at Convocation Hall (University of Toronto) May 22, 8:30 p.m.

An amazing synthesis of pop, jazz and world music.

Drawing on her Yemenite-Israeli heritage, Noa plays the Darbukkah (hand-held Arabic drum) and sings in English and Hebrew. In 1994, Noa and Gil were discovered by American jazz superstar Pat Metheny, who produced their first Geffen album which went Platinum (350,000 sold) in Israel and in France. Noa launched her North American career last year with a sold out performance at New York's Carnegie Hall.

Noa played with Yitzhak Rabin at the November 4 1995 peace rally, moments before the Israeli Prime Minister was assassinated. Her latest album "Calling" produced by Rupert Hine (producer for Tina Turner, Kate Bush and Rush) includes a tribute to Rabin and a song for the victims of Israel's latest bus bombings.

Tickets: TicketKing 872-1212, Matana Judaica (248 Steeles Avenue West), Edward's Record World (2359 Yonge Street)

Act boldly

Like yesterday's matzah, left unsold in the storerooms of Quebec's groceries, Premier Lucien Bouchard's constant hectoring of the federal government is somewhat hard to swallow.

The Globe and Mail reports that at a meeting on the last weekend in April of the Parti Québécois (PQ) national council, Bouchard reiterated to his colleagues, and through the media to Canadians across the country, his no-compromise commitment to sovereignty.

"The Parti Québécois program provides for three things – sovereignty, all of sovereignty, nothing but sovereignty ... As you know, after a victory of the Yes vote in a referendum, we will make an offer of partnership to Canada. Two things will happen – either the negotiations are fruitful or they are not. In both cases, Quebec will become sovereign."

At the closing session of the meeting, the premier attempted to deliver a pre-emptive strike against all federalists. In response to no particularly recent statement or initiative by the federal government, he threatened to call a snap election, hold another referendum and unilaterally declare independence if Ottawa challenges Quebec's right to secede.

"We will never allow Ottawa to adopt a law that would restrict in any way the possibility for Quebec to hold referendums."

The suggestion that taking measures in defence of Canada is inherently offensive to Quebec is nothing but a demagogue's ploy, a sword that cuts into the darker corners of nationalism, not a shield that protects a people's history, their way of life and their culture against encroachment from global commerce and continental linguistic uniformity.

Quebec's secession means Canada's disintegration. Thus, the federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments and every individual in Canada who loves this country, have the right, if not the obligation, to oppose that disintegration.

The federal government must not retreat to the side as separatists prepare their final march forward. Rather, it should act boldly on behalf of Canada at every opportunity. It should use its constitutional authority to promote Canadianism throughout the country, including in Quebec. It should protect Canada's interests against all efforts to cause them harm. To start with, the federal justice minister should consider joining the action launched in the Quebec courts by Guy Bertrand to declare separation-by-referendum constitutionally invalid.

To preserve Canada, the federal government should walk on every legal, political and popular avenue without fear of alienating the so-called "soft" federalists in Quebec. Perhaps they might be more inclined to embrace the values and the idea of Canada if they were to see the conviction and the determination of a government and a people fighting to keep a country together rather than the dissimulations and defiant declarations of an extremist elite fighting to tear it apart?

If Canada is worthy of our prayers, it is also worthy of our actions.

Six months ago

It was only six months ago, last Saturday night, that Yigal Amir shot Yizhak Rabin in the back and killed him. What stood still in shock and mourning, for only a few brief, sorrowful moments – the lives of people and the life of a nation – have inevitably continued on and forward. And since that awful, horrible evening, the people and the nation have endured still many more sorrowful moments.

Though it was six months ago, the loss is unabated.

Even his political foes, even people unalterably opposed to the peace process, even people who would not sing the songs he sang, know in the deepest part of their hearts that what was lost on that evening was far more than the life of a man.

Ottawa cares for Jewish students

As a Toronto student at Carleton University and as president of the Jewish Student Union-Hillel (JSU), I would like to respond to the article, "I'm Proud to be a Carleton Jew" (CJN, March 21).

Ottawa hosts a relatively large Jewish community of over 11,000 people. This community is very active in its programming and community support. After two years in Ottawa, I only became involved in the JSU last February. Through JSU mailings, which all paid members receive, the community has opened their homes to students for Shabbat dinners any Friday they wish, they have opened their doors to students for Passover seders and have helped fund students in residence for kosher for Passover meals.

The Jewish Students Union-Hillel, has also played an active role in outreach to its members. Once a month, JSU hosts a Shabbat dinner that attracts more Jewish students than similar event at McGill or U of T. We also held bagel brunches and weekly information tables on campus and monthly social events, and we have an active graduate student group.

Applauds decision on Malcolm Ross

In finding it irrelevant that teacher Malcolm Ross kept his opinions about an international Jewish conspiracy out of the classroom, the Supreme Court has illuminated a fundamental feature of anti-Semitic individuals: totality of mind.

The racist subscribes to a comprehensive attitude that cannot be selectively applied to a distinct group. It is a world view that is applied to people, to society and to history. By setting a precedent of protecting children not only from racist statements but from racists themselves, the court recognizes the fallacy of looking at an individual as a composite of elements whose individual ideas can be distilled and separately applied.

Jean Paul Sartre wrote that anti-Semitism precedes the facts that are supposed to call it forth. Experience and interpretations of historical and societal facts do not produce the anti-Semite's impression of the Jew, but rather vice versa. A teacher must expand, not narrow, the minds of students, encouraging them to develop their impressions of the world from their understanding of scientific, historical and societal facts. Racism enslaves the mind and cannot be confined to one sphere. Someone who finds it natural and intuitive to denounce another group necessarily has a perverted conception of humanity and should be prevented from influencing impressionable students.

Urges deportation of Kalejs

Konrad Kalejs is currently fighting deportation from Canada. We pray the authorities will not permit him to manipulate the system through delaying tactics as he did in the United States, where he fought off deportation for 10 years, through legal battles.

By promptly removing him from our midst, we will be sending a clear message that Canada will not become a safe haven for the new crop of war criminals.

Was it arrogance, contempt or guilt that prompted him to move into that particular condominium, which is home to a number of Holocaust survivors? For over 50 years, these tortured souls have been trying to come to terms with the nightmare of murdered family members.

Drinking a problem in Jewish homes

Re: Morton Weinfeld's article, "Alcohol use lower among Jews." (CJN, April 25)

I have seen demographic data taken from treatment centre populations where Jews have opted to hide their religion and to travel far from home to obtain help lest they be recognized or draw attention to their community. I have seen shock and disbelief in families, when faced with alcohol abuse in their homes. I have met Jews who described feelings of alienation from religious observance when they struggled with control over alcohol.

I also have witnessed signs of hope and caring. There are synagogues that have opened their doors to self-help groups for Jews desiring to recover from the abuse of alcohol and other drugs. Recovering Jews have gathered together for mutual support and religious observance. The efforts of such writers as psychiatrist Rabbi Abraham Twerski have been taken to community gatherings where the message that Jews are not exempt can be heard. These have been opportunities to address the shanda and denial that have marked alcohol misuse in our midst.

As the article proposes, alcohol use could perhaps be less in the Jewish community, but alcohol abuse and its effects on the sufferers and on those who love them are none the less devastating.

Archeology casts light on biblical events

By ALEX GROPPER

A Herodian pool is discovered in the excavations undertaken by Nahman Avigad in the Jewish quarter of old Jerusalem after the reunification of the city in 1967. Inset left, the mummy of Rameses II, considered by some to be the pharaoh of the Exodus from Egypt, and the father of Pharaoh Merneptah. Inset right, William Foxwell Albright. [Photos from The Bible as History, Werner Keller, and Digging up the Bible, Moshe Pearlman]

At this time of the year, as we gather to observe our holidays, there is a strong link between them and the rich and varied tapestry of our history. Passover celebrates our exodus from the slavery of Egypt, and Shavuot our coming together at Sinai over 3,000 years ago to receive the law and begin the process which would see our evolution as a community through the continuity of our history.

This sense of community and continuity is nourished through the education of our young. It is by means of learning, both formally and informally, that succeeding generations partake of our values and our history. History is an essential part of our heritage. As a historian and a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto these past 25 years, I have been fortunate to have played a small role in this process.

Ours is a tradition that stretches back thousands of years. One of the tangible enjoyments of teaching history and archeology is to see the impact of the most recent archeological discoveries on the interpretation of our past. Barely a generation ago, scholarship had arrived at a tenuous consensus on the early history of ancient Israel. One of the most important people responsible for this consensus was the American biblical scholar, William Foxwell Albright.

It was thought by many that the stories of the patriarchs were rooted in the period of the Middle East Bronze Age (about 2000 to 1500 BCE) in the history of the ancient Near East. Discoveries of cuneiform tables at the Syrian site of Tel Madikh (ancient Ebla) indicated an even earlier date for the patriarchal narrative according to some scholars, especially Albright's disciple, the American specialist David Noel Freedman.

Today that consensus has all but disappeared as scholarship has become buffeted by widely divergent views, some of which propose a late date for the composition of the patriarchal stories, as late as the time of the destruction of the northern kingdom (about 721 BCE) according to John Van Seters, or even later according to the eminent Toronto Egyptologist; Donald B. Redford.

Much the same thing has happened to the historicity of the pivotal events of the Exodus and the conquest of Canaan. Thanks to the discovery of an inscription by the Pharaoh Merneptah, which contains the first mention of Israel as a people already living in Canaan, most scholars looked to Merneptah's father Ramses II, and his grandfather Seti I as the pharaohs of the oppression and the Exodus. Even Hollywood sanctified this view as the gospel according to Cecil B. DeMille. As a result, most of us indelibly see these rulers as Yul Brynner and Cedric Hardwicke respectively.

Archeology further seemed to substantiate this view of the subsequent conquest of Canaan as a large scale blitzkrieg involving the destruction of such major sites as Hazor, which was excavated by the famous Israeli scholar, Yigael Yadin, in the late 1950s; however, one key site, namely Jericho, stuck out like the proverbial sore thumb. Excavations in the early 1950s by Kathleen Kenyon, and by A.D. Tushingham of the Royal Ontario Museum, indicated that the site was abandoned at the time of its supposed conquest by Joshua.

More recently, in the 1990s, scholars such as Bryant Wood are attempting to prove that Jericho may well have been destroyed when the Bible says it was. Yet overall, this monolithic interpretation of the conquest and settlement of Canaan have been called into question by the work of such scholars as Israel Finkelstein of Tel Aviv University.

Even the most famous figure in Jewish history, King David, has been the subject of some disquieting studies by scholars such as Baruch Halpern, formerly of York University and now the head of Judaic Studies at Penn State. New finds, such as the discovery in 1994 of an inscription mentioning the "House of David" at Tel Dan in northern Israel, are enriching our knowledge of this fascinating period. Excavations at the City of David in Jerusalem from 1978 to 1985, led by the late Yigal Shiloh, former head of the Institute of Archeology at the Hebrew University, have added to our knowledge of this crucial site which David conquered and made his capital. Thanks to the various Jewish excavations in Jerusalem since 1967, especially those by Prof. Nachman Avigad, we now know that many of the so-called Ten Lost Tribes of the northern kingdom of Israel survived its destruction by the Assyrians in 722 to 721 BCE and made their way south to Judah, settling in Jerusalem after 721 BCE until the Assyrian siege during the reign of Hezekiah in 701 BCE.

Archeology has also shown us that our ancestors did not fully heed the biblical injunction against idol worship. Many deities were found in households in Jerusalem, thereby deepening our understanding of the prophets and their dire warnings of destruction.

Indeed the excavations of the City of David, in which I was fortunate enough to have participated from start to finish, vividly reveal the depth of destruction, especially the Babylonian one which culminated in the obliteration of the First Temple and the beginning of the ensuing exile.

There is one poignant discovery of that destruction that has embedded itself in my heart and mind. It occurred in 1982, while we were excavating Area G., the location of the monumental Step Stone Structure and the riots of the previous year, which the world press dubbed "The War of the Bones."

The excavations turned up over 50 lumps of clay which were actually impressions of seals, known as bullae. Amongst the names on the bullae, one stands out — the name of Gemariah Ben Shaphan, who is inextricably bound up with the prophet Jeremiah in those tumultuous years preceding the destruction of the First Temple.

"In the fifth year of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of the Judah, in the ninth month, all the people in Jerusalem and all the people who came from the cities of Judah to Jerusalem proclaimed a fast before the Lord.

"Then, in the hearing of the people, Baruch read the words of Jeremiah from the scroll, in the house of the Lord, in the chamber of Gemariah the son of Shaphan the secretary, which was in the upper court, at the entry of the New Gate of the Lord's House." Jeremiah 36:9-10.

I pondered the significance of this small piece of clay no bigger than a thumbnail, which I held in my hand. The thought of it still sends shivers down my spine. The last time that seal impression had seen the sunlight of Jerusalem was on that fateful ninth day of the month of Av, as the first Temple and state were about to collapse in the flames of the Babylonian destruction. In the blink of an infinitesimal eye, it would next see the light of day 2,500 years later, cradled by Jewish hands in a new Jewish state.

The reason this discovery meant so much on a personal level was that at the time, my wife was pregnant with our first child. For me this discovery amongst the ashes of the Babylonian destruction is symbolic of our existence, continuity and rebirth as a nation. It has come to stand for the history of our people and ultimately our miraculous ability to arise from the ashes.

My daughter's grandparents were Holocaust survivors who arose from the ashes of Hitler's destruction to play a role in, and be present at, the birth of a new Jewish state, created after over 1,800 years of wandering and persecution.

We can only ponder these miraculous events of our history and wonder. Ultimately much of the answer lies beyond our grasp, obscured by faith and hope. Faith is almost impossible to verify by means of the quasi-scientific methods of the historian and the archeologist. Another more obvious reason for our survival is the emphasis that countless generations since that first group was exiled from Jerusalem "by the waters of Babylon" have placed on the beit knesset, as both a house of prayer and as a place to educate their children in the history, traditions and faith of our people. It is this role that institutions such as the Community Hebrew Academy fulfil and that makes them of paramount importance as transmitters of our priceless heritage as well as the training ground for future generations. It is a rare privilege to be a small part of this process.

Alex Gropper is an educator and broadcaster who has been teaching at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto since 1972.

A letter to Prime Minister Peres

Dear Prime Minister Peres:

As the elections in Israel near, I am saddened to see once again the distasteful negotiations between you and the religious parties.

By Jean M. Gerber

I am no stranger to the process of coalition-building, in which every Israeli government since the inception of the state has engaged. I deplore it, but I know about it. However, in this election, surely there are factors which make it clear to all that this time around, some modicum of principled political behavior is not only desirable, but necessary — necessary, that is, if Israel is ever to free itself from the ugly and, in some cases, unethical deals which need to be made in order to entice religious parties into an election-winning strategy. And necessary, too, for continued accord between Israel and Diaspora Jewry.

Let me be clear. First, I do not believe that the statement "religious party" is necessarily an oxymoron, although it is close. Second, if a party wants to call itself religious, then it better show some derech eretz in the way it operates. I fail to see this in any current processes, and so I consider that there is no such thing right now as a religious party. There are parties of people who call themselves religious. That's another thing entirely.

Let's look at what these people demand. They demand that two recent Supreme Court of Israel decisions be overturned by acts of parliament. The first case concerned the issue of nullifying conversions done by non-Orthodox rabbis; the second, that religious councils be allowed to disqualify non-Orthodox members (who, I believe, are duly nominated by constituencies).

In the latter case, the court overturned the council's disqualification of non-Orthodox members in Jerusalem and Haifa solely on the basis of religious affiliation. In the other decision, the Court ruled that there were no grounds to invalidate non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel. Mr. Prime Minister, you have set up committees to prepare legislation that would circumvent both these rulings.

As well, a member of your cabinet whom I respect greatly, Rabbi Yehuda Amital, is introducing a bill that would allow converts to be registered with the Interior Ministry only when they had a certificate from beit din of the Chief Rabbinate — which would mean continued refusal to recognize conversions done by non-Orthodox Rabbis. Reportedly the language of those bills would affect conversions both inside and outside Israel. I note that since 1980, all conversions outside Israel have been accepted and registered with the ministry.

Have you forgotten , Mr. PM, the uproar over who is a Jew the last time around? If you have, our local federations can supply you with ample evidence that the proposed changes were anathema to the vast majority of North American Jews. Ugly is too nice a word for the rhetoric that accompanied that last set-to. It was degrading, vicious and about as far away from halachic or any other principled discourse as any I ever saw. And craven is too nice a word for the government that was ready to contemplate wiping out at a stroke thousands of committed Jews in communities all over North America.

Please don't do this. Maybe it is time for Israel, a country which prides herself on the mission to be a light to other nations, to set aside one little candle for her own use in showing the way out of a moral morass.

And the religious councils? Of course they are just another symptom of the fear of the Orthodox establishment in Israel that if they allow any other voices to be heard except their own, somehow the people of Israel (in the widest sense) will be immediately weakened to the point where the whole edifice will collapse in a matter of days or weeks.

No it won't, Mr. PM. If Hitler couldn't destroy us, if we came out of that furnace with the strength to found a state and maintain strong Diaspora communities, then we can stand a little diversity of opinion within councils that have a common mission to support and strengthen community standards.

So I have several requests for you. One, please don't tamper with your Supreme Court decisions. I don't always agree with ours (you should see what recent Canadian Supreme Court decisions have produced; maybe it was the phase of the moon), but I will defend to the death their right to make them. Two please don't make distasteful deals with people who not only manipulate the political system for their own ends, but probably won't support you whenever they feel like it. Three, you may disregard my letter, but I refuse to believe that the Israeli people are not sick and tired of politics as usual and would not respect and reward principled behavior on your part.

Your obedient servant...

Jewish themes thriving on Broadway

This spring season, Broadway, New York City's famed White Way, has exploded with a rich and eclectic array of 60 shows. Revivals and restagings of hits of the past — The King and I, State Fair and Miss Saigon — are drawing record crowds. Probably the best of the revivals is Edward Albee's finely crafted A Delicate Balance.

By Arnold Ages

What is particularly interesting is the number of plays which deal either directly or indirectly with matters Jewish. Tovah: Out Of Her Mind at the Jewish Repertory Theatre is a one-woman extravaganza which permits Tovah Feldshuh to deploy her special charm in a rousing potpourri of songs and monologues on Jewish life. Her soulful rendering of a Sephardi chant called Avraham Avinu is worth the price of admission.

Tovah, whose dazzling smile first gained her an internation reputation for her role in the television series Holocaust, uses her extraordinary linguistic ability and talent for mimicry to transform herself from an 8-year-old child to an 80-year-old bubbie and from a retired Irish working man to Sophie Tucker, the "Yiddishe Mama" herself.

Jackie Mason is back for his third Broadway run in Love Thy Neighbor. He could just as easily have called it Too Jewish (by coincidence the name of an exhibition at the Jewish Museum on 91st Street, because the irrepressible Mason continues to have a lot to say about Jewish insecurities in a gentile world.

Mason's hilarious observations about Jewish-gentile relations today are inspired. "When I was a kid growing up on the East side, the Italian kids used to attack me for killing their savior. I told them I wasn't even in the neighborhood. It is true, that they are no longer blaming us for that [the crucifixion]; now they are accusing us of selling them [the Romans] the lumber!"

Mason's most brilliant repartee, however, is non denominational and focuses on the inanities of computers, the Internet and e-mail. "With computers, they tell me that you can read 3,000 newspapers. Who wants to read 3,000 newspapers?" In the uproarious 10-minute segment on the computer, Mason projects a time in the future when someone will invent, wonder of wonders, a newspaper.

Newspapers in the early 1970s were full of the Watergate scandal and the resignation of president Richard Nixon. One play, Russel Lee's Nixon's Nixon, purports to recreate a scene which took place in the Oval office between himself and secretary of state Henry Kissinger on the eve of the resignation. The play exploits the well-known Nixonian paranoia and depicts Nixon's not so latent anti-Semitism ("the Jews own the press").

Where it enters new and controversial territory is the near libellous portrait it offers of Kissinger, shown here as a brilliant but equality ruthless and unscrupulous politician anxious to protect his own exposed flank. Here Kissinger tries to persuade Nixon to resign "for the good of the nation" and to urge Gerald Ford to keep him on as secretary of state.

The mood changes, however, when Nixon shows him a transcript of Kissinger's taped conversations that contain material so compromising and inflammatory that Kissinger explodes into a paroxysm of indignation, panic and visceral fear. Kissinger now discovers that it is in his interest to keep Nixon on as president. The only topic on the minds of patrons leaving the Westside Theatre was the possible content of the Kissinger tapes.

There is no overt Jewish theme in Jack, the story of John Barrymore, interpreted by the gifted Nicol Williamson, which opened last month at the Belasco Theatre, the very place where the famous American actor presented some of his most inspired Shakespearean roles. But there is a subtle Jewish subtext in the second act of the work.

After a meteoric rise on the American and British stages in the 1920s and 1930s, Barrymore, having no new worlds to conquer, emigrated to Hollywood, where a series of bad roles, advancing alcoholism and marital problems soured the career of the theatrical genius.

A fourth element is identified by Barrymore himself as the vulgar eastern (read Jewish) financial interests behind the producers whom he encountered during his acting career and who treated him shabbily. This disquieting note, which few in the audience even noticed, does not in any way detract from Williamson's magisterial performance and incarnation of Barrymore.

Reversing history

When you travel from Tel Aviv to Haifa and look eastward to the hills, you will see one of the oldest settlements in Israel, Zichron Ya'akov, which is located on the southern spur of Mount Carmel. It was founded about 115 years ago by Romanian Jews who belonged to the Chovevei Zion movement, and their settlement became for some time one of the country's favorite health resorts. It is indeed a place of beauty, with pleasant orchards and a long tradition of famous Jews who lived there. Baron Edmond de Rothschild became its patron and gave it the name of his father James de Rothchild, whose Hebrew name was Jacob (Ya'akov).

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The events of the last few weeks have once more turned public interest to Zichron Ya'akov and to a special group of Germans who live there. Many Israelis wonder and say: "What do these people do in our country? Let them go home and contemplate what they have done to the Jews."

Who are "these people?" They came 30 years ago from Germany, fundamentalist Christians whose reading of the Christian Bible made them believe that in the impending Divine judgment of the world, the Jews need to be protected from their enemies, and especially the Jews in Israel, without whom no universal salvation is possible.

The Germans have established a factory called Beth-El, which specializes in the production of NBC (nuclear, biological and chemical) filtration systems designed for use in collective shelters during an enemy attack.

Their mission is to defend as many Jews in Israel as possible from unconventional enemy attack. Thus, the Beth El factory is today Israel's only producer of complete NBC filtration systems for communal shelters. Believing that sooner or later Israel's enemies will resort to chemical or biological weapons in their desire to wipe out the Jewish state, NBC filtration is considered one means of protecting the civilian population.

But why is it that these Christians have come from Germany to protect Jews — an odd reversal of history? Because they have adopted a fundamental Jewish saying: "If you can save one life, it is as if you have saved the whole world" — and thus they can help to make up for the sins of their own people.

Do they find their industrial pursuit profitable? Yes, but the profits go primarily to charities in Israel. The government has on occasion been suspicious of their activities, but lately their contribution has been recognized.

What precisely does their contribution do to a people who, during the Gulf War, were already accustomed to wearing gas masks? The answer is simple: Not everyone can wear a gas mask. Claustrophobia is heightened by its wearing and some people simply cannot manage it. I know, because that's how I lost a cousin in Israel during that war. He was asked to go into a sealed room and don a mask. He died in that room from an attack of claustrophobia and anxiety.

Next time you drive up to Haifa or take the bus, cast a glance at the first reaches of the Carmel and think what unusual people Israel contains.

Multilaterals vital to success of peace process

Call it the stealth peace process.

Everyone is familiar with the bilateral track of the Middle East peace process, referred to in shorthand as the bilaterals.

Not as many people, however, are aware of a second set of Mideast negotiations known simply as the multilaterals.

The bilaterals — which deal with the multitude of problems accumulated from the past — have generated significant general interest and massive press coverage. By contrast, the multilaterals — which focus on the future of the region — have drawn yawns from the public and have elicited surprisingly little response from the media.

Fundamentally political in nature, the bilaterals turn on such basic Arab-Israeli questions as territorial withdrawal, the demarcation of final borders, security arrangements and the nature of normalization.

The offspring of the 1991 Madrid peace conference, co-sponsored by the United States and the Soviet Union, the bilaterals revolve around Israel's negotiations with the PLO, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan. (For the moment, Israel's talks with Syria and Lebanon are in a state of suspension.)

Complementing the bilaterals, the multilaterals are designed to find solutions to theoretically non-political issues of mutual concern, so that regional cooperation and security can be fostered in an atmosphere of shared confidence.

Launched in Moscow in January 1992, the multilaterals are divided into five working groups: water resources, environment, economic development, refugees and arms control/security.

Israel, Jordan, Egypt and the PLO are the main participants. Syria and its protectorate, Lebanon, have boycotted the sessions. The Syrians claim that such issues cannot be properly addressed until Israel promises to withdraw from the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon.

Syria's attitude has not inhibited other Arab countries from attending the multilaterals. They are Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, Mauritania, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Oman, Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates.

The multilaterals have also attracted the United Nations, the World Bank and the European Union, as well as 26 nations, notably the United States, Canada, Britain, Germany, Japan, China and India. The expertise and financial resources of these countries and institutions are deemed vital to bolster a comprehensive and lasting peace accord.

Unlike the bilaterals, the multilaterals have not been restricted by geographical constraints. The water working group, for example, has called meetings in Austria, Jordan, Oman, Greece and Switzerland. The venues of the refugee working group have been Canada, Norway, Tunisia, Egypt and Turkey. The environment working group has met in Japan, Holland and Bahrain.

The economic development group has been hosted by France, Belgium, Italy and Sweden. The arms control and security group has had meetings in Russia, the United States and Qatar.

Chaired by the United States, the water resources group has planned workshops and research projects in such realms as water conservation/enhancement and desalination. A regional data bank and a research centre are to be built in the region.

Recently, Israel, Jordan and the PLO signed a declaration on the management of water — the first of its kind in the Middle East.

The environment working group, chaired by Japan, grapples with topics ranging from maritime pollution (in the Gulf of Aqaba) and wastewater treatment to desertification and environmental management.

The economic development group, chaired by the European Union, is the largest of the five working groups. It seeks to create "a new set of mutually beneficial relations between the parties and the building of a new era of economic prosperity for the region as a whole."

Projects encompass transportation (highways, railways, ports and aviation), energy (linking the electricity grids of Israel, the Palestinian autonomous areas, Jordan and Egypt), tourism (regional cooperation), agriculture (plant protection), regional trade (Germany is producing a study of potential avenues of cooperation), and finance (training of banking personnel).

This working group has arranged major economic summits in Casablanca (1994) and in Amman (1995). These conferences endorsed the decision by the Gulf Cooperation Council to rescind the secondary and tertiary boycott against Israel, and agreed to set up a Bank for Economic Cooperation and Development, a Regional Tourism Board and a Regional Business Council.

The refugee working group, chaired by Canada, has drawn up an agenda to establish a data bank on the Palestinians, to facilitate family reunification and to improve the welfare and living conditions of Palestinian refugees in their present location.

The arms control/security group, chaired by the United States and Russia, focuses on operational and conceptual matters.

There have been workshops on verification mechanisms, communication measures and the exchange of military information.

A Regional Security Centre in Jordan, with branches in Tunisia and Qatar, is to be established.

In retrospect, the multilaterals have been fairly successful, though, as Joel Peters points out in an exhaustive monograph entitled Building Bridges, they have dealt mainly with procedural rather than substantive issues.

Cases in point:

•The working group on water resources illustrates the difficulty of separating non-emotional functional questions from hot-button political disputes. Syria's snub of the multilaterals means that problems relating to the Jordan River, its tributaries and the Sea of Galilee cannot be placed on the agenda.

•The Palestinian refugee problem can only be resolved on the bilateral level, once final status talks between Israel and the PLO get under way.

The Palestinians regard this working group as a forum for addressing their political rights and solving the substantive concerns of the refugees. Israel, on the other hand, regards the issue in mainly humanitarian terms.

•The practical usefulness of the arms control working group is inherently limited. First, the Arabs perceive arms control as a means by which to impede their military capabilities. Second, Israel has turned a deaf ear to Arab demands to discuss its nuclear arsenal. Third, Syria, Iraq and Iran are not even present at the negotiating table.

•The economic development working group is dogged by Arab fears that Israel's ultimate objective is to dominate the Middle East.

Despite these stumbling blocks, the multilaterals have allowed Israel and most of its Arab neighbors to address and focus on long-term issues, which will have to be settled once the bilaterals are finished.

Viewed in this light, the multilaterals are not only necessary, but absolutely vital for the success of the peace process in the Middle East.

Impressions of Poland

Worth reading...

In 1924, Alfred Doblin, the German-Jewish novelist, playwright and journalist (Berlin Alexanderplatz) travelled through Poland for two months, visiting 10 cities and recording his impressions of Polish Jewry. Journey to Poland (Paragon House, $21.95 US) was originally published in 1925 in German. The English edition, ably translated by Joachim Neugroschel, is a fascinating spiritual journey of a non-practising Jew who was startled by the lifestyle of Orthodox Jews, shocked by their poverty and appalled by the hatred in which they were held by Poles.

Fine reference books are hard to come by. A History of the World in the Twentieth Century (Harvard, $39.95 US), filled with cogent essays, is one of them.

Eli Evans is in his most engaging mode when he plumbs the depths of the Jewish experience in the American South. He did so in two previous books — The Provincials and Judah Benjamin. In his latest book, The Lonely Days Were Sundays (University of Mississippi Press, $25 US), a collection of eclectic essays, Evans shines when he addresses the subject he knows best. But when he enters the realm of U.S. presidential politics and Israeli history, he is less interesting.

Developing chesed

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

Many people know that the Hebrew word chesed means lovingkindness. As Jews, we are urged to develop our nature to display this distinctive and important quality. Being kind and sensitive to the needs of others is one way to demonstrate our concern and involvement with those around us — as well as our commitment to better the society in which we live.

Perhaps one can see a reference to this teaching in the Torah portion this week. In Parshah Behar we are told: "Do not give your money on interest and do not give your food for which one will have to give increase." (Leviticus 25:37)

As is well known, the taking of interest violates one of the laws in the Torah. This prohibition is of such importance that there is a midrash which states that on the Day of Judgment, all sins a person has committed will be presented for debate between accusing and defending angels, with the exception of the sin of taking interest. For this sin, we are told, there will be no deliberation, just immediate condemnation.

Why should the commandment against the taking of interest be seen so harshly by the midrash? One may suggest the following as a possible response. The loan of money to one in need is clearly an act of chesed. However, when the loan is only given on interest, the act of generosity and goodwill becomes a business transaction. Chesed, where the giver is motivated by concern for the welfare of the recipient, disappears and in its place is greed — where the giver is prompted to action by the prospect of his own personal gain.

Kindness should be performed altruistically, without regard to compensation. If one has the opportunity to lend money interest-free to a person truly in need, and instead charges the recipient for the use of the money, perhaps the lender fundamentally changes the very nature of this situation. No longer can these circumstances be described in terms of chesed, as this quality has been completely removed in favor of personal greed.

I think that this may be why the midrash views the sin of taking interest so severely. One opinion in our tradition teaches that the world was created to make possible the performance of chesed. Therefore, any dimunition of this essential characteristic is deemed worthy of immediate condemnation.

We do not claim to be angels; indeed, our survival in G-d's world requires that we do many things for ourselves. But the things that we do for ourselves should not be to the exclusion of what we can do for others. If we see the taking of interest as an act that diminishes chesed in the world we can see why it would be prohibited by the Torah. However, we should come away from this teaching with a renewed commitment to treat all people with kindness and sensitivity, and do acts of chesed altruistically wherever possible.

Kiev has long Jewish history

By MICHAEL CRELINSTEN

Kiev has the forlorn air of royalty fallen on hard times. Soviet-style architecture, designed for an intended 20-year lifespan, stands bleak and faded grey 40 years later. It is ironically appropriate to the unsmiling mood of this city, its people and the winter-barren greyness of both the sky and the winding Dnieper River.

Guest Voices

And yet, particularly for the Jewish community, royalty it was. It is the home of Shalom Aleichem, who lived in the apartment building at Krasnayarmeski 5. At 29 Schekovitskaya St., you can still find Kiev's synagogue, now run by Rabbi Bleich and looking in some ways as regal as it did when it first opened in 1894.

The city hall still houses a Jewish day school, a mikvah and a matzah factory, the latter of which proved to be one of the warmest places in the city, thus warranting several visits.

Kiev is also the site of Babi Yar. In late February, we visited this bleak ravine on the outskirts of town where, by conservative count, more than 33,000 Jews were shot and killed during World War II. We visited the site of the Jewish monument erected on Sept. 28, 1991, the 50th anniversary of the first killings. The sanctioning of an explicitly Jewish memorial, that it had so long prevented, was one of the last official acts of the government of the Soviet Union, which would itself pass into history later.

The day that began at Babi Yar would end later at ulpanim and youth clubs run by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), symbolizing one of the greatest triumphs of our time — the ability of a people to transcend their experience and extend the limits of the possible.

We were given to further reflection later that day following visits to some of Kiev's elderly Jewish residents. Sitting in their homes, we were exposed to the numbing, desperate poverty they face, along with the inspirational work of the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) to help these isolated Jews.

Subsequent to our apartment visits, we descended the peeling, crumbling, cold staircases and climbed back onto the bus which would carry us to the JAFI ulpan. Here, Kiev Jews who wish to learn Hebrew and emigrate to Israel are being taught a new language. We noted painfully that many of the youngsters studying in the Na'aleh 16 program will not realize their dream of studying in Israel, in significant part because of limited resources.

In discussing this dilemma with Dr. Joseph Tropiansky, head of the JAFI unit in Ukraine, we noted that this was not simply a function of fundraising limitations, but also a function of priorities — not solely local versus international priorities but also of priorities within the Jewish Agency itself.

The following day, we visited Zhitomir.

The work being done at the JAFI youth clubs in Zhitomir is remarkable in that it creates a climate of community solidarity and a sense of purpose, as well as providing a welcome respite from the drab minimalism of daily life.

Throughout Ukraine, the frustrations and difficulties of daily life are mirrored in the continual array of cars with their hoods up, obviously in a state of disrepair. The roads, apartments, buses and street cars all reflect, as well, the economic free-fall that confronts the citizens of Kiev and Ukraine.

Our visit cast an entirely new light on the gordian knot of local needs versus overseas commitments and reminded us, in graphic terms, that we, as Jews, belong to a people and a history. Our community cannot simply cocoon itself within the admittedly compelling realm of our local needs. If we essentially disengage, we have to understand that we are abandoning our partnership with the Jews of the FSU and of other distressed lands.

In removing ourselves from this partnership, we risk diluting the nature of who we are and eviscerating some of the most fundamental and central components of our identity as Jews, both historically and in contemporary times. Our visit to Kiev instilled deep pride in our community's contribution to this work. It reminded us that there remains a frontier to inspire us that we have a critical place on that front.

Israel election hits the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

When Israelis go to the polls on May 29, they will have a wealth of information available to them to help them decide their future. And for the first time, some savvy political parties and lobbying groups are using the Internet to convince voters to choose them. Because the Information Highway stretches around the world, you can look in on these sites to understand the choices facing Israelis.

Most of the sites which we will visit in this column are in English or are bilingual but some are in Hebrew only. (For information about reading Hebrew on the Internet, please see the Jewish Highway of April 25.)

For a good overview of how Israelis do politics, take a look at the explanation offered by the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs [http://www.israel.org/news/elec1996.html]. Thanks to electoral reform, Israelis will actually vote twice – once for Prime Minister and once for their choice of Knesset party. Some of Israel's 21 registered political parties [http://www.israel.org/news/parties.html] have produced sophisticated sites with profiles of their candidates and a summary of their platforms. Others have minimal Internet presence or none at all.

In fact, I could not find an official web site of the ruling Labor party. However, there is a detailed biography of Prime Minister Shimon Peres at [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/gov/peres.html]. For his views on the peace process, check out Peres' recent interviews and speeches at [gopher://israel-info.gov.il:70/1m/new/leaders1].

The opposition Likud party offers a nicely designed home page [http://usa.likud.org.il/] with a detailed discussion of party policy. There you'll find links to a Benjamin Netanyahu page with transcripts of recent speeches and interviews given by the Likud leader.

Meretz is a left-wing coalition partner in the Labor government and offers a Hebrew-only site [http://www.meretz.israel.net/]. However, there is a short English language biography of Meretz leader Yossi Sarid at [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/gov/sarid.html].

New on the Israeli political scene is Yisrael Ba-aliya [http://www.ix.co.il/y_aliya/home.htm]. Best known for its leader Natan Sharansky, this party wants to make immigration and absorption of Jews a top national priority.

If you have been able to find other official sites of registered political parties in Israel, please e-mail me their addresses and I will try to mention them in a future column. While some parties have been slow to make use of the Internet, there are many Israeli political and special interest groups with a strong presence on the Jewish Highway. Many of them are listed in the Politics section of The Ultimate Jewish/Israel Link Launcher [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/politics.html].

Now that you've brushed up on the nuances of the Israeli political system, it's time to make your voice heard. You're not an Israeli citizen? Don't let that stop you. Vote in The Israeli '96 Elections CyberPoll. You can have your choice of political parties at The Ultimate Israel Knesset Ballot [http://www.agmonet.co.il/agmonet/elect/vote/kneset/ultvote.htm] and for Prime Minister [http://www.agmonet.co.il/agmonet/elect/vote/prime/ultvote.htm]. By the way, this poll won't have quite as much impact as the one on May 29.

Undeniable truths

Hitler's Willing Executioners, by Daniel Jonah Goldhagen Knopf ($39.95).

The message of this explosive work is clear and definite: the vast majority of Germans shared Hitler's hatred of Jews and willingly — sometimes even eagerly — participated in the crime of genocide. With impeccable scholarship, the author refutes the usual defences offered by apologists for German behavior: they didn't know about the mass murders; they were following orders or compelled to commit atrocities against their will; they were mere cogs in a gigantic bureaucratic machine, not of their own making or comprehension.

To all of these excuses Goldhagen, a 36-year-old Harvard professor shouts an angry denial. He asserts that most of the murderers were not people trained to kill, not members of the dreaded SS or even fanatical Nazis.

After studying the personnel of work and death camps and police battalions he makes clear that commanders allowed anyone reluctant to engage in killing to assume other duties and that the choice could be made without penalty. Yet, of the 4,500 men in the nine battalions, "virtually all of them chose to kill and to continue to kill and many went beyond the call of duty by volunteering for improvised search and destroy missions."

Even when Heinrich Himmler, chief of the SS, hoping to negotiate with Americans at the end of World War II, forbade the further killing of Jews, some Germans kept on.

Goldhagen makes clear that anti-Semitism permeated all segments and classes in Germany including the proletariat, the professions and the churches. It was a society in the grip of a pervasive hallucination that went back 400 years to the fulminations of Martin Luther.

Did something develop in the German character that made possible the Holocaust? "Germans were treating Jews as they did, not because of any military necessity, not because German civilians were dying in bombing raids ... nor for any traditional justification for killing an enemy, but because of a set of beliefs that defined the Jews in a way that demanded Jewish suffering as retribution, a set of beliefs which inhered as profound a hatred as one people has likely ever harbored for another."

Especially agonizing to read is the author's description of death marches toward the end of the war, which had no purpose other than the sadistic killing of helpless victims. On the day before a Nazi area came under American army occupation, "three ethnic German guards removed the Jewish women from the barn, marched them through a wood, always uphill, as if to sap them of their meagre remaining strength. During the half hour of unremitting climbing, the women began to fade. The three guards shot whoever could not continue the ascent, one by one, until 14 of the 17 women were dead. They finally allowed the three who were still standing to go free."

This book will be published in Germany next August. It has already been denounced there as defamatory and extreme. In a recent interview, the author was quick to acknowledge that Germany is a very changed country: "After 1949, it was against the law to make an anti-Semitic statement. It's very hard for an individual to maintain views the whole world is saying are wrong. Germany is the great success story of the post-war period. The Germans have remade themselves into liberal democrats."

This disturbing work with its terrible and undeniable truths is a major, irrefutable contribution to our understanding of the most calculating and destructive genocide in human history.

Tougher affirmative action laws urged for Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Skin color remains the "deepest" obstacle to the integration into Israeli society of Ethiopian émigrés, Israel's minister of immigrant absorption said here last week.

Yair Tsaban said he wants stronger affirmative action laws for Ethiopians, to counter what he called a "tremendous" cultural gap between them and other Israelis.

Tsaban was in town for the opening of an exhibit on Ethiopian Jews at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum. The display, Beta Israel: The Jews of Ethiopia, combines everyday artifacts with photos depicting life in Ethiopia and in Israel.

After touring the exhibit, Tsaban told about 200 people, including representatives from 15 ethnocultural groups in Toronto and members of the city's small Ethiopian community, that no other immigrants receive as much government aid as do Israel's 57,000 Ethiopians.

Israel invests up to four times as much in Ethiopians as in other newcomers, including almost free 28-year mortgages and low-interest student loans. "And believe me, it's not enough," Tsaban said.

Israel has enacted its first-ever affirmative action quotas for Ethiopians, but "much more sensibility is needed. We must prove that we can overcome our differences. For Israeli society, this is a test of honor."

Tsaban did not mention the recent debacle over the Israeli blood agency's discarding of blood donations from Ethiopians.

Over 30,000 Ethiopians have come to Israel in the last five years, including the 14,000 airlifted by Israel in May 1991, Tsaban said.

Barbara Ribakove Gordon, director and chair of the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), recounted the story of the miraculous airlift carried out over just 36 frantic hours while rival armies faced each other in the capital, Addis Ababa.

The exhibit, on loan from NACOEJ, provides a fascinating glimpse into Ethiopian Jewish life with its brightly colored fabrics, metalwork, religious articles and musical instruments. It also conveys the sheer joy of the fulfilment of what Ethiopian Jews believed was their destiny: to one day reach the Promised Land.

The exhibit is not to be confused with a similar show at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on Ethiopian Jewish life before and after Israel's 1991 rescue.

The Beth Tzedec exhibit runs through June 28. Hours and information on group tours are available by calling 416-781-3511.

Historian Draper documents survivors' testimony

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People are often surprised to learn that Paula Draper is not a child of Holocaust survivors, nor did she lose any family members at the hands of the Nazis.

By 1904, in fact, her relatives had left Europe for North America, some as far back as the mid-1800s.

Draper, a Toronto historian with a down-to-earth manner and a penchant for dramatic jewellery, is committed to documenting the testimony of Holocaust survivors, a task she first undertook in 1977 as a graduate student at the University of Toronto, where she completed both her MA and PhD degrees.

In 1986 she became director of the oral history project of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, conducting many of the 400 interviews now in its collection.

Most recently, in addition to having a book and documentary film in progress, she has been working as a lead trainer of interviewers for the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation (filmmaker Steven Spielberg's international project to document survivor testimony.)

"I feel very strongly that as a Jew I'm as connected as anyone else to the Holocaust," Draper said in a recent interview. "The Holocaust is part of our history. It's something we must understand."

As an undergraduate student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1973-4, Draper enrolled in one of the first courses on Holocaust Studies, and decided she wanted to continue in that field.

She traces her interest in history to her late father, Darrell Draper, an Ontario Court judge who had "a real interest in and love for" the subject.

In the past year, for the Spielberg project, Draper, an enthusiastic traveller, has been to Amsterdam, Tel Aviv, Johannesburg, Capetown, Frankfurt, Berlin, Paris, Prague, Buenos Aires, Warsaw, Sydney, Australia and a number of American cities to train Jewish and non-Jewish volunteer interviewers.

Paula Draper

For her, one of the most profound lessons to be learned from survivors is that it's possible to rebuild a life after a life-shattering experience. "We have a lot to learn about the human capacity for rebirth."

Public reaction to Spielberg's award-winning movie Schindler's List "has legitimized the experience of the survivors and given them a comfort level [with] which to record their stories."

Reclaim past

Three years ago, Draper interviewed a Holocaust survivor living in Saskatoon who had never spoken of his wartime experience. Recently he sent her a package containing the first 13 chapters of his autobiography. She was tremendously moved that he had "begun to reclaim his past" as a result of her interview.

Her work with Spielberg's Los Angeles-based foundation has affected her in a similar way. "It's the most meaningful experience I've ever had and I imagine I'll ever have, with the exception of creating the Holocaust museum."

Draper wrote everything in Toronto's 10-year-old Holocaust Memorial Centre, from the display captions to the script for the short documentary film.

Her career has led to her involvement "in very significant issues of our decade, of our community and of our history."

One of those issues was the 1987-88 trial of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, where she served as historical consultant, an experience she recalls on one level as "an interesting intellectual exercise in deconstructing historical fabrications. I examined every quote in his pamphlet and showed how he took [each one] out of context."

But she is angry over the pain he and other deniers have caused Holocaust survivors.

She had no career path, she claims. "Did I know? I'm not particularly ambitious. I've gone down this very winding path and it's taken me to very significant issues in our community."

Arditti launches support group for MS patients

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Perla Arditti

TORONTO — Perla Arditti wants to make life better for people who, like herself, have multiple sclerosis (MS).

In 1993 the 36-year-old Toronto woman, who was diagnosed in 1982, began co-ordinating a program for "MS-ers" as the first step toward creating a multi-faceted resource for people with MS. Co-sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) and the then Jewish Community Centre (now the Bathurst Jewish Centre [BJC]), the project offered life skills workshops, educational programs, counselling, an exercise program and a Jewish context.

Although the program closed last August — partly because of funding cuts and partly because of a need to expand — Arditti continues to coordinate twice-weekly programs for MS-ers as an interim measure. The sessions, held at the BJC, offer exercise and social networking.

Most of her time, however, is taken up with a new project that she says will be the only one of its kind in Ontario. Arditti has created the MS Access Support Association, of which she is executive director, to offer a range of MS-related services — educational, aquatic and social programming, one-on-one physical training and a resource library — under one roof.

The non-profit association is a registered charitable organization with a 14-member board of directors handpicked by Arditti. Among them are a neurologist, two MS-ers, two parents of MS-ers, an occupational therapist, a lawyer and two professional fundraisers. Negotiations are under way for a centrally-located facility which will include a swimming pool.

Members will be charged an annual or monthly fee to use the facilities, Arditti said. She intends to have exercise equipment including wheelchair-accessible weight training machines and a Motomed, which is a stationary bicycle with an active-passive mode for the physically challenged.

Exercise is very important for MS-ers to maintain muscle tone which would otherwise be lost, Arditti said.

The disease breaks down myelin, the substance which covers nerves, resulting in symptoms such as weakness, visual disturbances, fatigue, poor balance and lack of coordination. Over 6,000 people in the Toronto area are known to have MS.

"The need is tremendous," said Arditti. The new association, which will have a small staff to begin with, is seeking volunteers, funding and donations of equipment.

They have obtained corporate sponsorship, but not as much as they need, Arditti said. JF&CS has offered to provide counselling services and facilitators for educational workshops, she added. She would like to have counsellors on staff once the association is more established.

Arditti believes her association will answer a need by housing the services under one roof. "Right now for any services, individuals have to go to different places throughout the city. There is no one clearinghouse, so to speak."

Arditti hopes to have her facility up and running by the end of this summer. She can be reached Monday to Friday from 9:30 to 4:30 at 905-882-9327, or fax 905-882-4656.

Security measures evaluated

Most users of the centre returned the following day, but three families said they were planning to permanently remove their children from the Babe Care Centre.

Immediately after the bombing, all Jewish institutions in Calgary went on high alert and began an intensive evaluation of security measures. A security expert from the Israeli Consulate in Toronto was sent by the Jewish Agency to evaluate the situation.

At both Akiva Academy and Calgary Jewish Academy, security measures were re-evaluated and some changes were made.

"Among parents and children there is caution and concern," said Gay Libin, president of Calgary Jewish Academy. "But the attitude is that whoever is behind this is not going to get the best of us — we're going to go back to normal ... with increased caution."

No one has so far claimed responsibility for the bomb.

"With the information we have today, it is impossible to know whether any long-term meaning can be taken from this incident," cautioned Hal Joffe, community relations chair of Canadian Jewish Congress and co-chair of CJCC.

Although this is the most serious attack Calgary has experienced, it is not the first. In 1991, Molotov cocktails were thrown at the Jewish Memorial Chapel, causing minor damage. In 1989, two white-supremacists were sentenced to five years in a failed plot to blow up the Jewish Centre.

JNF shaliach Ron Krumer said it is too early to tell if there is any significance in the fact that the parcel was addressed to his office.

Members of the Calgary Jewish community were encouraged by the many expressions of support which poured in to the Calgary Jewish Centre. The letter sent by Premier Ralph Klein, the flower arrangement from Oakridge Co-op, calls from friends and family everywhere, all helped the community recover from the shock.

Meanwhile, Calgary police and the RCMP have began an intensive forensic study of the bomb components, which will hopefully reveal clues as to the perpetrator of the crime.

Inspector Bill Sherlock of the Calgary police cautioned members of the Jewish community: "If you get a package you were not expecting and if it looks suspicious to you, exercise utmost caution. And don't hesitate to call us — we'd rather come out and look at the thing than come out later to pick up the pieces."

Ner Israel Yeshiva celebrates 36th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you want to raise your children well, get involved in communal life, advises businessman and philanthropist Sandy Hofstedter.

Hofstedter and his wife, Kitchie, were honored recently at the 36th annual Ner Israel Dinner, held at the Constellation Hotel. The date coincided with the anniversary of their marriage 50 years ago.

"Enjoy your life, yes," he said. But "you can send your kids to the best schools, but if they don't see an example of how you live your life for others too, it won't mean anything."

In a voice that frequently broke with emotion, Hofstedter told of both he and his wife returning from the concentration camps, to find that most of their families had been murdered.

"We were broken in spirit and financially. We were going like drunks, asking ourselves 'Where was G-d?' "

But after a few months, he said, "we began to make peace. We realized that we don't understand G-d's ways. That we had to rebuild our lives; to do what we had to do.

"And now we thank HaShem for helping us build a new life together."

The Hofstedters' family and friends established a Torah Endowment Fund in their honor, which will give scholarships at the yeshivah to 15 boys a year.

Guest speaker Rabbi Yakov Perlow, the Novominsker Rebbe, called Hofstedter "a yid from the alter heim, with a burning commitment to transplant and rebuild our [the Orthodox] way of life" in North America.

He "represents those people who lived through the churban, remembered the world before, and were given the strength to see it again in their own families and in their new communities."

Special greetings were brought by Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, spiritual leader of Clanton Park Synagogue, to which the Hofstedters belong; Rabbi Gavriel Ginsburg, rosh yeshivah of Ner Israel, and Zvi Hofstedter, a student at the yeshivah and the couples' oldest grandson.

Son George Hofstedter acted as dinner chair, and David, another son, and son-in-law Mordechai Mandelbaum also took part in the program.

George Hofstedter noted the presence of Markham Mayor Don Cousens, and Vaughan councillors Bernie Green and Mario Racco.

North York, Haifa to sign friendship agreement

NORTH YORK — North York Mayor Mel Lastman and Haifa Mayor Amram Mitzna will sign a friendship agreement between the two cities when the Haifa mayor visits Metro Toronto June 2 to 4.

The agreement will be a prelude to the "twinning" of the two cities, a concept generated when Lastman and a North York delegation including councillors Michael Feldman, Denzil Minnan-Wong and David Shiner visited Haifa last June for the Israel Forum International Economic Conference.

Haifa, a beautiful northern city on the Mediterranean, has a population of 350,000 and is Israel's third largest city.

The history of excellent relations among Haifa's populations of Jews, Arabs, Christians, Druze and Bahais, predates the British mandate era. Two of Israel's institutions of higher learning make their homes in Haifa — the Technion and Haifa University.

The current accord undertakes to promote a friendly exchange between the people of the two cities, to cooperate in such fields as economy, trade, culture and science and technology for the benefit of both Haifa and North York. Also to be explored will be the possibility of exchange between hospital personnel and cooperation in medical technology.

Mitzna, who serves as chair of the Haifa Foundation will participate in An Evening in Haifa, an event sponsored by the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation on June 2 at 8 p.m.

How to predict the future.

My father taught me that it's not what you say, but what you do that's going to make a difference. We have to make this world a better place than the one we were born into.

That's why I give a yearly endowment to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation.

The people at Mount Sinai showed me how even a modest gift over time can earn enough interest income for the hospital to really make a difference. Today, because of gifts like mine and thousands of others, Mount Sinai has grown to become one of the finest research and teaching hospitals on earth.

Does that make the world a better place? I think so. Through the simple act of giving, we all have the power to make real change, not only during our lifetimes, but beyond.

The way I see it, it's not hard to predict the future. All you have to do is invent it.

אנשים מדברים בקלות על כל מה שנוגע בהם ישירות: עבודה, ילדים, כאלה דברים. אז ככה: בתור מי שמבלה חלק לא קטן מחייו בשדות התעופה ובמטוסים, אני מפתח חכמת חיים טיפשית וספציפית ללווינים. חוק ראשון: לקחת כמה שפחות. ממילא לא משתמשים בחצי ממה שלוקחים. חוק שני (יותר קשה): אם בכלל אפשרי - קחו איתכם ואל תשלחו בבטן המטוס. זה כמובן קשה בנסיעות ארוכות, אבל מה - יש עכשיו מזוודות קטנות, זולות, על גלגלים שמתאימות לתקן עליה על המטוס איתכם. כמעט כל יום אני שומע סיפורים על מזוודות שלא הגיעו. ועוד יותר חשוב: לתגיע למקום רחוק עייפים אך רצוצים ולחכות למזוודה שעה - ממש ענוש! חוק שלישי: אל תאכלו (שלא תעיזו) בטיסה רק בגלל שמגישים לכם! בטיסות טרנס אטלנטיות זה תמיד באמצע הלילה, כשבני המעיים ישנים ונוחרים. - תעזבו אותם בשקט! תאכלו בזמן הטיסה רק מתי שאמורים הייתם לאכול ממילא. זה ימנע מיכם להרגיש עייפים, מנופחים ומפלצים. רבים מחברי, כדי לישון טוב בטיסות טרנס אטלנטיות, לוקחים כדור שינה קצר טווח, שעוזב את הגוף תוך מספר שעות ומונע את תחושת הטשטוש הממושכת של ואליום. או תשמעו סיפור: חבר טוב שלי, גם כן רופא מעופף, היה צריך לטוס לאירופה כדי לתת הרצאה כמה שעות אחרי הגעתו. עולה למטוס, לוקח כדור שינה, שם משקפי שינה ושוקע. כעבור שש שעות מעיר אותו מישהוא. זה הדייל, הוא אומר לו: דוקטור, רציתי רק שתדע שבגלל תקלה במנוע עוד לא הגענו". עושה הדוקטור חשבון מהיר ורואה שלא יצליח, אפילו אם יצא עכשיו, להגיע להרצאה שלו, יורד מהמטוס ונוסע הביתה. לך תספר אחר-כך שישנת בשדה התעופה שש שעות.

JRC holds dinner

TORONTO — Over 500 guests recently attended the first black-tie dinner of the Jewish Russian Community (JRC) at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto.

Leslie Dan, chairman and CEO of Novopharm Ltd. made the toasts to Canada and to the State of Israel. Art Eggleton, minister of trade, brought greetings on behalf of the federal government and Garth Drabinsky, CEO, Livent Inc., addressed the guests as the evening's keynote speaker. The head table was introduced by Mark Breslin.

Yaacov Erez, JRC campaign director and the event coordinator, discussed the significance of the dinner as an indication of the growth of the community.

In his remarks, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, spiritual leader and executive director, reminded the guests that this was the birthday of the Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who had sent Rabbi Zaltzman to Toronto 10 years ago to work with the Russian Jews who came to live here.

Silent and live auctions later in the evening were followed by a video entitled Biography of a Revival and a music program by Russian performers.

Proceeds from the event go to the JRC educational programs.

Community March and Festival fever

There's more than ever before in store for Community March for Israel participants on May 26, once they finish their journey. The March starts once again this year at the Promenade Shopping Centre.

For the first time, the Festival following the March, co-sponsored by UJA Federation and Canadian Zionist Federation, is being held indoors at North York Centennial Arena (Finch west of Bathurst). That means Festival fun rain or shine.

"This year's Jerusalem 3000 Festival will be the best ever," predicts CZF coordinator Tillie Margolis. "There will be something for everyone," adds Marcy Kroach, who with Gilda Naiman represents UJA Federation on the Festival committee.

In keeping with Jerusalem 3000 celebrations, Festival organizers have lined up entertainment, activities, refreshments and food with a Jerusalem flavour. "Even the entrance to the building will make all festival goers feel like they've just passed through the Old City gates," says Margolis.

From 11 a.m. - 4 p.m., Festival goers will be treated to Israeli music, performing troupes for adults and kids and a Jerusalem-style shuk (market). Among the many additional Festival features are:

This year's Jerusalem 3000 Festival is designed for both younger and older community members.

- A live auction for bidders to buy everything from toys to vouchers for weekend getaways
- The Original Stars Band, Liberty Silver and the Tree Top Kids, with live performances
- Prize presentations to the winners of the Halleluya 1996 song competition
- A special excerpt from the musical play Our Jerusalem, performed by 35 Toronto area high school students
- A petting zoo, pony rides and clowns
- A 12 year old Canadian chess champion to challenge any eager opponents.

Israel's Consul General Jehudi Kinar and North York Mayor Mel Lastman will deliver greetings during opening ceremonies at 1 p.m.

Registration for the 10:30 a.m. March begins at 9:45. Look for the sponsor sheet on this page to be handed in with collections.

Everyone submitting at least $18 will receive a free T-shirt. For every $50 raised, your name will be entered in a draw to win a free trip to Israel.

Canada Trust joins the March

Canada Trust is sponsoring the Community March for Israel. It's the first time a financial institution has backed UJA Federation's most popular annual event.

"We're thrilled," said Jeff Cohen, who is co-chairing the March with Maura Cooperberg. "It's the beginning, we hope, of an ongoing association that will benefit both Canada Trust and UJA Federation."

Sherry Weiss, Manager of Branch Banking for Canada Trust, sees her company's association with UJA Federation as a "big advantage" for the community.

Starting Monday May 6, any Metro area Canada Trust branch will accept Community March collections in a special account. A receipt, issued by Canada Trust, will provide proof of deposited donations in order for marchers to receive a free T-shirt or qualify for a free trip to Israel. A T-shirt will be given to anyone who collects at least $18, and for every $50 collected, a marcher's name will be entered in a draw for the Israel trip.

Sponsor sheets will be available at selected Canada Trust branches in Jewish areas of the city.

Joel Sheinfeld speaks to Mission 3000 participants at a lookout at Kfar Haruv overlooking the Golan. Many Mission members will be taking part in a special challenge at this year's Community March for Israel.

March and mission combine for Israel

Mission 3000 participants are challenging each other to raise the most money at this year's Community March for Israel. The call to action came from the Mission's bus 18 after a recent reunion.

Mission 3000, February 19-29, sponsored by UJA Federation and United Israel Appeal of Canada, was the largest organizational visit to Israel in Canadian history.

Elaine Waltman, the official challenger, thought it would be a great way to unite Mission participants and give something back to the community. "It's our way," she says," of thanking UJA for providing us with an incredible Israel experience."

Waltman sent 400 letters to Mission members explaining the challenge before contacting bus captains to ask for their support. "Everyone is really excited about the idea," she reports.

Community March for Israel walkers, who participated in Mission 3000, will be trekking together under a special Mission banner. Another bus 18'er, Ruth Altman, is even preparing a song for the group in order to "add spirit and to keep it cohesive."

Please call your Mission 3000 bus captain to get involved in the challenge. And may the best bus win.

Trials and Jewish justice probed

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The O.J. Simpson case and several other recent "trials of the century" fall far short of meeting the traditional Jewish concept of justice and law, a U.S. legal expert and TV commentator told a Toronto audience recently.

The Simpson case in particular reflects contemporary society's values and how those beliefs can subvert a just result, said Laurie Levenson, a Los Angeles-based criminal lawyer, CBS legal consultant and student of Jewish law.

"If you think he got off because he didn't [do it], check your drinking water," she said.

Levenson, a member of the academic advisory council of the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, analyzed the Simpson case and others from a perspective of Jewish law and found the results wanting.

Speaking to about 100 people at the Beth Sholom Synagogue, Levenson said the Simpson case raised issues of "idolatry," race, contempt for women, overreliance on unqualified jurors and an inexperienced judge.

Jewish law requires equal treatment under the law, but Simspon, one of society's "false idols," got much more than that.

Laurie Levenson

Which other alleged double murderer would be allowed to turn himself in? Who else would be allowed to hang four of his courtroom suits in the judge's chambers or have his jail cell renovated? she asked.

Why is a man who carried a football even considered a hero, when there are teachers, rabbis, doctors and parents who are more deserving? she asked.

Turning to the issue of race, Levenson said one-third of young black men are defendants in criminal justice cases. For many blacks, the Simpson case contained a "mentality of payback" as they asked why would it be so bad if one of their own got off.

As for the role of women in the trial, Levenson said that while the Jewish ideal for women is "not perfect," it includes a tradition of woman as judge and warrior (Deborah) and as the voice of justice and peace (Leah Rabin).

In the Simpson case, on the other hand, Nicole Simpson was a "trophy wife," who was virtually sold into "bondage" by her family.

Prosecutor Marsha Clark was repeatedly criticized by the media for her outward appearance, while Judge Lance Ito rebuked her when she asked court to recess at 6 p.m. on Friday night so she could pick up her children. Ito said "real lawyers" sometimes work all weekend, Levenson stated incredulously.

Turning to Ito, Levenson, who was in court for the entire trial, suggested "he got swept up by this case."

He didn't have the life experience required of judges by Jewish law and he didn't know how to keep the lawyers under control.

Furthermore, because his wife is a top policewoman, he left himself open to defence attacks if his rulings favored the prosecution.

Under Jewish law, the judge should have no personal stake in the case, Levenson said.

The lecture was sponsored by the new leadership division of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and by Goodman Phillips & Vineberg.

Census to examine ethnic origins

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This month's national census will not ask Canadians about their religion, but will inquire about their ethnic origin.

And as in previous headcounts, among the choices for ethnic origin will be Jewish.

Respondents will be allowed to list up to four ethnic groups to the question, "To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did this person's ancestors belong?"

The ethnic question, however, will appear only on the long form of the census, to be mailed to one in five Canadian households.

Ottawa is asking everyone to mail in their census forms by May 14.

Censuses in years ending in "6" — the so-called mid-point tallies — do not ask about religion. But those in years ending in "1" do, Statistics Canada spokesperson Vanessa Mungal told The CJN.

In 1991, many Jewish Canadians said they found the question too personal. Last year, Canada's Privacy Commissioner agreed, and after consultations with StatsCan, said questions about religion, fertility and dwelling status would not appear on the 1996 forms.

However, a question on common-law relationships does appear on both the long and short forms this year.

As for being Jewish, Ottawa has considered it both a religion and ethnicity for decades.

The 1991 tally found that 318,070 Canadians were Jewish by religion, while 369,565 listed Jewish as an ethnic background.

Those results were then analyzed and blended at McGill University in Montreal for a more accurate snapshot, which found that in 1991, there were 356,315 Jews in Canada.

Excluded from the total were those who said they were Jewish by ethnicity but who stated another religion.

Among the findings of subsequent studies were that more people identified with Judaism as a religion in Ontario and Quebec than in British Columbia, which had a high degree of identification with Judaism as an ethnicity.

Numbers culled from the census have traditionally yielded a treasure trove of data for planners and officials in the Jewish community, who use them to chart everything from migration, poverty, assimilation, intermarriage, education levels and employment.

Thus, Jewish organizations are asking respondents not to shy away from answering the ethnic question accurately.

For help in answering any census questions, call the Census Help Line at 1-800-670-3388.

B.C. United Church resolution deplores 'anti-Jewish' sentiments

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

PARKSVILLE, B.C. — A resolution calling on British Columbia members of the United Church of Canada to encourage "firm and positive attitudes" toward the Jewish community and stress continuity with Jewish history was unanimously approved by the church's B.C. conference at its annual meeting here May 4.

According to Rev. Tom Bulman of Vancouver, the resolution was passed unanimously by the 642 members of the clergy and lay leaders in attendance. The resolution was submitted by the Vancouver South Presbytery, which comprises some 20 United Church congregations. Delegates attended from all parts of the province.

The resolution acknowledges that anti-Jewish feeling and teaching in the church "have contributed to and are in large measure responsible for anti-Jewish atrocities through the ages."

It noted that one-third of the world's Jews were murdered in the Holocaust and this "continues to haunt us as a vision of the dark side of Western culture ... We as Christians can no longer deny nor avoid our responsibility in this matter."

Anti-Jewish feeling is represented in Scripture readings and preaching, "in spite of clear evidence that anti-Jewish sentiment goes against the spirit of both the Scripture and the central message of church doctrine."

The resolution says "there may well be residual and anti-Jewish sentiment present in United Church congregations."

'Our eyes were covered with blindness'

To help bring about a rapprochement between Jews and Christians, the resolution proposes that B.C. congregations displace anti-Jewish sentiments by emphasizing that both Jesus and the apostle Paul were Jews and never disclaimed that fact, nor that Jews were "God's Chosen People." In the future, Gospel teaching will adhere to and stress these ideas.

In Scripture readings, when the term "the Jews" is used in a pejorative sense, the phrase will be replaced by words such as "the Judeans" (southern Jews around Jerusalem as opposed to "the Galileans" of the north), or the use of the term the Jews will be explained in terms of the polemic of the times in which the Gospel writers lived.

In the church readings, "we will remind ourselves that Israel is still God's covenant people."

During Holy Week before Easter, congregations will be reminded that while some Jews did betray Jesus to the Romans, "it was the gentiles who killed him."

Help bring about rapprochement between Jews, Christians

After Holy Week, B.C. churches will be encouraged to use the prayer written by Pope John XXIII: "We now recognize that for many centuries our eyes were covered with blindness so that we no longer saw the beauty of Your chosen people and no longer recognized the features of our firstborn brother. We admit that the sign of Cain is on our forehead. For centuries, Abel was lying on the ground in blood and tears because we had forgotten Your love. Forgive the curse we unjustly pronounced over the name of the Jews. Forgive that we crucified You again in their flesh."

Rev. Bulman told The CJN five Vancouver rabbis were consulted in the preparation of the resolution and that further consultations will be held with all streams of Judaism in B.C.

He said the resolution is not binding on church members, but clergy will be encouraged to get the message across. Copies will be sent to all United Church provincial conferences in Canada and it is hoped it will be discussed at the annual national conference next year.

Dr. Richard Menkis, who lectures on Jewish-Christian relations at the University of British Columbia, said in an interview the acknowledgement that the Jews did not kill Christ is important.

"The change of deicide has been the point of departure for some very ugly attitudes toward the Jews," he said. The debate within the United Church reflects discussions among liberal theologians who have been rethinking the relationship between Judaism and Christianity, he added. He said theologians are trying to dissociate Christianity from anti-Semitism.

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Goldie Hershon thinks the committee that studied CJC's election rules should have recommended spending guidelines for candidates for officer positions, and specifically the subsidization of Plenary Assembly delegates.

"This was a key issue. In effect, they have sanctioned what [Thomas] Hecht did. In principle, it means you can buy the presidency," Hershon said.

The report says the committee, headed by Judge Herbert Marx, was "unable to conclude whether or not to recommend spending guidelines for candidates. It would be too cumbersome to implement and monitor such spending guidelines."

It adds that candidates have "traditionally provided financial support to enable delegates to attend and vote at a plenary. As well, candidates of modest means have been able in the past to raise the necessary campaign funds."

Hecht paid the registration and transportation costs of some of his supporters, which he points out is not prohibited.

Hecht considers himself "vindicated" by the report.

"I believe that CJC owes an apology to the very great number of committed Jewish people who came to be involved with CJC and were disenfranchised by the monumentally flawed registration procedures during the plenary," he said, as well as to himself and his supporters for "the abuses" his opponents, he says, subjected them to. He estimates about 150 people who would have voted for him were never registered.

He is also heartened the committee recommended that, "to prevent any appearance that principal actors in a plenary organizational structure are partial," all candidates and their key campaigners not be permitted to hold a plenary position for 90 days preceding it.

Under these rules, he says Hershon's candidacy would have been disallowed and some of her campaigners would also have been disqualified.

Hershon, however, feels she had no advantage in being chair of the plenary up to and some days after her declaring herself a candidate about a month before last May's plenary. In fact, if she had not resigned the chairship, she feels it might have hurt her campaign.

"The last month before the plenary is when you get down to the nitty-gritty, like planning menus; it's not glamorous, and I might have been too busy to campaign," she said.

Hershon thinks the 90-day deadline for nominations for officer positions, another recommendation, is too early.

"I would suggest two months is enough; even politicians have 50 days to [file their papers]," Hershon said.

Hecht took solace in the oblique apology the report makes to him for what he called a "dastardly character assassination attempt." The report condemned the sending to the media of anonymous allegations against Hecht just before the plenary as "odious and pernicious behavior."

In principle, Hershon is in favor of earlier deadlines for all delegates — the major thrust of the committee report — but thinks the recommendation that applications for organizational delegates' be received no later than 30 days in advance may be too far off. "But it should be at least 10 working days in advance."

She's also a little perplexed that the committee set the minimum "good standing" for a delegate at $18. "The Montreal federation says it is $36, so I don't know why they came up with $18."

Marx is not making any public comment on the report, except to emphasize that the committee adhered to its mandate "to review the electoral issues based upon previous plenary experiences in order to make recommendations for changes" to the CJC bylaws.

WHICH POLITICAL COURSE WILL BE MORE LIKELY TO INCREASE CONFRONTATION, TERROR AND REGIONAL WAR ?

The Government of Israel is on a course which will end the occupation and separate Israelis from Palestinians, creating a clearly defined border between the two societies.

The Opposition would continue the occupation, expand the settlements and limit the Palestinians to municipal autonomy only.

Neither course will totally end terrorism.

But if peace talks fail, the pressures for terrorism and regional war will escalate.

If peace talks succeed, the process of historic reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians will prevail. The opportunities for regional stability, co-existence and prosperity will grow.

Canadian News Hall of Fame honors former MP Simma Holt

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Simma Holt, the first Jewish woman to have been elected to the House of Commons, also became the first B.C. woman journalist to be inducted into the Canadian News Hall of Fame.

Her induction at a ceremony in Toronto on May 4 places her in company with such luminaries as Peter C. Newman, Pierre Berton and June Callwood.

Holt, a native of Vegreville, Alta., near Edmonton, which at one time had a thriving Jewish population and synagogue, joined the Vancouver Sun as a reporter in 1944. Now 74, she is continuing her journalism career. She left the Sun several years ago to write books and then to become involved in politics.

As a reporter, Holt was made an honorary fire chief, in recognition of stories she did on the Vancouver fire department.

She specialized in investigative reporting and one of her favorite stories was of her getting a confession out of a murderer who had been released after appealing his murder conviction. Shortly after his release, he confessed to Holt that he had indeed committed the murder and had an uncontrollable urge to kill. Holt took him to her home, where he signed a confession. She then turned him over to the police.

Holt is currently using her investigative experience in her work with the Citizens for Jonathan Pollard, the U.S. Navy employee convicted of spying for Israel. She hopes that some day she'll get him freed from his life sentence without parole.

Simma Holt

She worked on the campaign team for George Bush, she told The CJN, and discovered that the Pollard affair "was almost in every respect a repetition of the notorious Dreyfus affair in France 100 years earlier — a strictly political matter."

Holt said that like so many people, "I believed Bush was a man of integrity. But it soon became clear to me that he was a classic Ivy League anti-Semite."

When Bush was asked, just before he left office, why he didn't offer amnesty to Pollard, which he had done for some political friends who were in trouble with the law, his reply was, Holt said, "The Jews didn't support me in the election; let the new guy [Bill Clinton] do it."

Holt said Clinton got about 3.5 million letters seeking clemency for Pollard, and she personally received a "Dear Simma" reply, promising to revive the case. Nothing much has happened, she said, but "none of us has stopped writing to Clinton of his promise."

Holt was elected an MP from Vancouver-Kingsway after leaving the Sun, served one term and then was shunted off to the National Parole Board — another first for a Jewish woman.

Brought up in a strongly Zionist family, Holt opposes the peace process and thinks giving the Palestinians the West Bank is "an absolute folly. It can mean the end of Israel. They'll never be secure."

Winnipeg Jewish community introduces Shem Tov awards

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has borrowed a page from the Toronto Jewish federation's book.

On May 8, the WJCC is presenting its first annual Shem Tov Awards. The awards recognize volunteers whose efforts on behalf of WJCC's beneficiary agencies have bettered the community.

The winners this year include Harry Gutkin, longtime president and driving force behind the Jewish Historial Society of Western Canada; Evelyn Katz, a past president of WJCC, officer of the Council of Jewish Federations and the community's chief statistician; Ken Kronson, the man behind the long-running YMHA/JCC Annual Sports Dinner; Ira Micay for his work with the Jewish Child and Family Service; Abby Morris, a past president of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education; John Plantz who has devoted his time to the Jewish Public Library and is working on a book on a Manitoba Jewish farm colony; Gordon Pullan Q.C., past president of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Sharon Home, who has also been active in numerous Jewish organizations; and Sharon Wolchock, currently national president of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada.

"We were inspired by the Toronto Federation Awards," says Evelyn Hecht, WJCC director of community relations, "but ours are a little different. We approached all our beneficiary agencies to submit nominations and presented awards to all nominees. In Toronto, it is a competition because there are so many more beneficiary agencies.

"It is important to recognize the work of volunteers in the community and raise public awareness of the work they do," she said.

About 400 people are expected to attend the awards.

Limited progress made in kosher labelling kerfuffle

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Last week's much-anticipated meeting beween the Office de la Langue Francaise (OLF) and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) saw only limited progress made on the kosher labelling kerfuffle that triggered a storm of controversy over Passover.

According to David Sultan, director of CJC-Q's community relations department, the OLF, in its first meeting with the CJC-Q as part of a joint task force struck April 12, agreed to interpret a Quebec French Language Charter regulation in a way that will permanently exempt imported Passover products from French-labelling requirements — a previous major sticking point between the two sides.

Sultan said the OLF also indicated it would allow such products to be available for sale for the same time period as exists under federal law — 60 days prior to and 30 days after the holiday.

But the meeting failed to produce the expected written commitment CJC-Q had said was imminent.

The task force is not expected to meet again before the tail-end of this month, Sultan said.

One of the issues not yet resolved is the length of time the exemption should apply.

In the CJC-Q's view, the regulation — which exempts French-labelling requirements from products in "limited use" — should also apply year-round to kosher products available only through import in "limited quantities," Sultan said.

A similar view has been voiced by local kosher food importers, who have complained about impossibly high costs in keeping up with Charter regulations and argued that the law infringes upon religious freedom.

The OLF, however, sees the exemption as applying only for the Passover period.

Sultan said, "What we're seeking right now is a long-term solution, the modalities for applying the regulation."

However, he did not believe that the failure so far to produce a written agreement resulted from Premier Lucien Bouchard's recent repeated pledges to have the OLF enforce the Charter to the fullest possible extent.

To the contrary, Sultan thinks it's the OLF that has felt a measure of "political pressure" to resolve the dispute, particularly in light of Bouchard and Louise Beaudoin, minister in charge of applying the Charter, having expressed regret — if no explicit apology — over the "Matzahgate" affair.

Meanwhile, B'nai Brith League for Human Rights chair Allan Adel told The CJN last week said his organization will press ahead with legal action to protect future kosher Passover imports, regardless of the status of negotiations between the OLF and CJC-Q.

"We have not filed the action yet, but the decision has been taken and not changed," Adel said. "We'll be proceeding as soon as it [the legal brief] is ready."

Recently, the OLF sent a letter to Maryse Ohayon, president of the Communauté Sépharade du Québec, officially acknowledging that it had no way of knowing whether complaints it had received about English-only labelled Passover goods came from members of the Sephardi community, since it keeps no such records.

Widespread media reports to that effect infuriated members of the community.

The letter blames "certain media" for the erroneous report, saying comments by OLF officials were reported in a "particular way."

Winnipeg Jewish centre named for Izzy Asper

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg has received a gift of $2 million from Izzy Asper, chair and CEO of Canwest Global Communications Corporation.

The complex, which will have cultural, educational and recreational facilities, will be known as the Asper Jewish Community Campus. It will be dedicated by Izzy and Babs Asper and family as a tribute to all those immigrants who came here in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, among whom were Izzy's parents, Leon and Cecilia Asper.

Asper made the gift to campus through the Asper Foundation, which he established in 1983 as a Canadian charitable organization.

Scheduled to open in the fall of 1997, the campus will offer a modern community centre, a three-tiered Jewish school covering junior kindergarten to Grade 12, a library and lecture theatre, the Jewish Museum of Western Canada and key community organization offices.

Viewpoints editor Abrams steps down after 16 years

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Convincing the machers, mainly hard-nosed business types, that the community needed a publication devoted to Jewish intellectual discourse was a tough sell, Bill Abrams admits.

But for 16 years, Abrams managed to edit and raise the money to publish Viewpoints, quarterly, as a supplement to — but independent of — The Canadian Jewish News. When he turned 80 at the end of last year, Abrams decided it was time to hand the reins over to someone else.

Abrams first love had been Jewish thought, and he had written over the years for various journals, but he was not a stranger to bottom-line considerations: he made his living retailing women's wear.

After selling his eight stores, Abrams was able to pursue full time what he liked doing most. At the 1977 Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly, he got a resolution passed to revamp Viewpoints, a sporadically produced booklet with a few hundred subscribers and dependent on Labor Zionist support that ended with the election of Likud.

"I felt there was a need for serious, intellectual discussion of Jewish life and Judaism in Canada today. I felt there was more to being a Canadian Jew than fundraising, and that it was time to get beyond the usual topics of Holocaust, anti-Semitism and Israel," he said.

Bill Abrams

Abrams also felt the growing number of academics with an interest in Canadian Jewish and Diaspora issues should have a forum, as well as those "so-called alienated Jews" who had little outlet.

In these broad aspects he feels he succeeded. "I think we were able to raise the consciousness of the Canadian Jewish community."

Abrams, active with the Conservative movement, is not satisfied, however, that he brought many around to his belief that the future of Judaism is in synagogue life.

He hoped Viewpoints would spur congregations into more social action. "Synagogue Jews should be in the avant-garde of the battle for human rights ... If we call ourselves 'chosen,' we have to take seriously what that means."

It took three years to raise enough money to ensure Viewpoints' regular appearance as a feature in The CJN. Annual revenue in recent times has come from the Toronto-based Oscar Yolles Foundation and annual mail solicitation. For a few years, The CJN has not charged for the printing and distribution to about 50,000 homes.

Viewpoints has remained nominally under Congress auspices and received office space and clerical support from it. A disclaimer that opinions expressed were not necessarily those of Congress has allowed Abrams and his editorial board a relatively free hand.

At first, Abrams was concerned about getting enough of the right material, but he has rarely lacked for the quality he has sought, even though the pay was only $100 for articles that average 2,000 words.

Abrams worked with an annual budget of just over $25,000 a year, helped by wife Jeanette and daughter Judith. Finding a replacement for Abrams has not been easy, given the terms.

The last Viewpoints came out at the end of 1995, and it's future remains uncertain. "The main question mark is whether we can assure its financial well-being," said board chair Harold Waller, a McGill political science professor.

The hope, however, is to keep the same format and scholarly mission, Waller said.

VSO honors composer on birthday

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Composer Murray Adaskin was honored by the Victoria Symphony Orchestra (VSO) recently, on the occasion of his 90th birthday, which he celebrated on March 28.

The VSO played an entire program of Adaskin music. Earlier in the month, the University of Victoria (UVic) also honored him with an all-Adaskin concert featuring the Lafayette Quartet and bassist Gary Karr.

Toronto-born Adaskin, the son of Latvian immigrants who fled to Canada to avoid persecution of the Jews, was a violinist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for many years, along with two brothers.

He came to Victoria to teach at UVic in 1972 and after retiring, decided to stay on and continue to compose.

At the VSO concert, one of his numbers played was T'Filat Shalom — a Prayer for Peace, which he composed in 1986 for a friend in Saskatoon. The number was played in Israel over national radio. At the request of the CBC, he orchestrated it for a special radio program on the network.

Adaskin, still spry and busy at 90, with no plans to quit, studied music in Toronto, including 10 years at the Royal Conservatory of Music. His older brother was his first teacher.

In the very early days of his career, he played background music for the silent movies at Toronto's Uptown Theatre. "That was a lot of fun," he commented in a phone interview with The CJN.

Adaskin said composers of serious music, especially Canadian, rarely witness concerts devoted solely to their works and the UVic concert was the first all-Adaskin performance he had ever attended. He said it was "a tremendously moving experience."

He wrote his first piece, Serenade for Strings, in 1934, when he was a member of the Melodic Strings orchestra on CBC radio. To celebrate the 100th program of the group, Adaskin and other musicians were asked to create compositions for the broadcast. That started him on his long career as a composer and he still spends four or five hours a day in his basement studio composing. It's something he just can't give up, he says.

Adaskin composes his numbers using a piano, but because "I'm not a pianist," he never performs them publicly on piano and transposes his works into music mainly for string quartets and bass.

The composer agrees with the assessment of him by the Encyclopedia of Music in Canada as "a modernist without being a radical." His music is melodic, often rhythmic.

He thinks there is a "Chaplinesque quality" in much of his work, influenced by the fact that he and his brothers were given a regular weekend treat of attending shortie Chaplin films. The boys would act out the film for their parents when they came home.

Adaskin said his parents encouraged their sons to become musicians. One brother, Harry, became a professional violinist and another, John, was a CBC producer.

Israel, PLO enter final stage of negotiations

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – In a ceremonial opening last Sunday night in Taba, Israel and the PLO met to inaugurate the third and final stage of their negotiations, which began with Oslo 1 three years ago and are expected to end with a permanent peace agreement by 1999.

The delegation heads, Foreign Ministry Director-General Uri Savir, and PLO top negotiator Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), both spoke of the promise of the future and the end of past conflicts.

"We do not have 'the right of return' to the past," Savir said, using a phrase central to both Israeli and Palestinian nationalists.

Both men also referred to terror as belonging to the past.

Savir called for political separation to encourage mutual cooperation and respect. It is necessary to break down "psychological walls" because what is important "is not just mutual recognition but mutual acquaintance," he said.

He made one overtly political statement, asserting that Jerusalem will remain the eternal, united capital of Israel, while Abbas called on Israel to remove obstacles to a Palestinian state next to Israel.

The two delegation heads met for more than two hours before making their speeches.

"This meeting is very symbolic. Its importance is to show that Israel and the Palestinians respect their agreements and have started the talks on time," said Nabil Shaath, Palestinian Authority planning minister.

The time leading up to the start of substantial Oslo 3 talks sometime after the May 29 elections is seen as the last chance for implementing unfinished business from Oslo 1 and 2, such as the establishment of safe passages between Gaza and the West Bank and redeployment from Hebron.

"According to the Declaration of Principles we are not allowed to transfer issues from the transitional period to the final stage," negotiator Saeb Erekat told the Al-Ayyam daily last Sunday.

The final stage of the process will deal with six issues specifically identified in the Declaration of Principles and with "other issues of common interest" - such as water - over a period of up to three years.

An agenda is to be established with committees to deal with these issues, but no one is expecting fast progress. As both delegation heads said, there will be a time of getting better acquainted in order to make the psychological breakthrough necessary for the important challenges ahead.

The three most important and ideologically charged issues are Jerusalem, settlements and 1948 refugees. The three others - security arrangements, borders and relations with neighbors - are more technical and will largely follow the contours of the solutions to the other three problems.

Informal talks have already begun on Jerusalem and settlements, while the issue of 1967 refugees has been discussed for the past year.

At this point they stand as such:

•Jerusalem – Israel says Jerusalem is its eternal undivided capital.

The Palestinians say Jerusalem is their capital too, but are willing to take the Arab-populated parts only and keep the city undivided physically.

Some of these Arab neighborhoods are outside of the Jerusalem municipal borders and are already in area B, under partial Palestinian control. The Islamic holy places are under the control of the Wakf, so the talks are not starting from zero.

•Settlements – The most important question is how many settlements if any will be annexed to Israel, and how many will come under Palestinian control, thus determining Israel's final borders. Will settlers in settlements which are not annexed be allowed to remain where they are as Israeli citizens and as permanent residents under a Palestinian administration? Will they be subject to Palestinian law if they stay?

Although radicals demand the removal of all settlers, many moderate Palestinians have spoken in support of leaving settlers where they are if they accept Palestinian rule up to the 1967 borders. Behind the apparent moderate stand is an assumption that most settlers will leave rather than accept Palestinian rule.

Refugees from 1948 – How many refugees will be accepted into the areas under Palestinian control and into Israel itself? Talks on Palestinians who fled in 1967 or were outside the country during the Six Day War have revolved around the issue of who is a refugee. Palestinian figures are some four times greater than Israeli figures. Some Palestinian figures accept the idea of compensation for most refugees if the principle of return is accepted.

To solve these three issues in a way satisfactory to a majority of Israelis and Palestinians will take immense flexibility.

Peres receives PNC resolutions

canceling the provisions that are contrary to the letters exchanged between the PLO and the government of Israel."

The decision to amend the charter was taken at a session of the PNC in Gaza on April 22 to 25, he said.

The text reads: "The Palestinian National Council, at its 21st session held in the city of Gaza ... decides:

"1.The Palestine National Charter is hereby amended by cancelling the articles that are contrary to the letters exchanged between the PLO and the government of Israel on 9 to10 September 1993.

"2. Assigns its legal committee with the task of redrafting the Palestinian National Charter in order to present it to the first session of the Palestine central council."

"We remain committed to the peace process," Arafat added in his letter to Peres.

No debate was held on the issue at the cabinet meeting.

The chair of the PNC legal committee, Faisal Hamdi Husseini, said last Sunday that 21 articles of the Palestinian Covenant had been cancelled or changed in the new covenant, which will be prepared within three months.

Husseini, not to be confused with Jerusalem PLO chief Faisal Husseini, has been empowered to draft the new covenant. This is the first time that a senior PNC official has stated exactly how many articles in the 33-article covenant are to be amended.

Natan Sharansky: From refusenik to politician

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

Former prisoner of Zion Natan Sharansky spent nine years in the Soviet gulag before arriving in Israel as a free man in 1986. He served as head of the Zionist Forum, an immigrant lobby group, before throwing his hat into the political ring last year to lead Israel Ba'Aliya. The new political party places immigration and absorption at the top of its agenda. But its platform covers all areas of Israeli life from education and Diaspora relations to ecology and human rights.

On security issues, the party calls itself centrist, accepting the principle of Palestinian autonomy but rejecting the establishment of a Palestinian state.

In economic matters, the party favors privatization and less government intervention.

CJN Israel correspondent Leora Frucht interviewed Sharansky at his party's Tel Aviv headquarters – one floor of a dilapidated building a block away from the old Central Bus Station.

CJN: Every government declares aliyah to be a primary goal. Yet you claim that successive governments have failed to address the needs of immigrants. Are the country's leaders merely paying lip service to aliyah?

N.S.: There are differences in perception. Israel has absorbed an influx of immigrants equal to 10 percent of its population and no one is on the streets or dying of hunger.

In a normal society, you could call that success. In a state whose raison d'être is the ingathering of exiles that's not enough. Immigrants must feel they are an integral part of society. From this point of view, the absorption of immigrants is far from a success. Immigrants are not working in their profession, have lost their status and feel that the establishment doesn't care.

CJN: In what ministry could you have the most influence?

N.S.: I'm not thinking about a ministry. I want to see a situation in which being appointed to the government's cabinet on absorption becomes as important and desirable as serving on the security cabinet – something that is not the case today.

Immigration is a security issue. Bringing another million Jews to Israel is as important as secure borders.

CJN: Would minister of absorption be the obvious post for you?

N.S.: Not necessarily. It depends on what real power that ministry has. Today it is almost a symbolic post. It's not only a matter of money, but influence – how much that ministry can influence the decision making of other ministries.

We don't want to be given the absorption ministry just to pacify us. We want absorption to be made into a top national issue like defence.

Natan Sharansky

CJN: I have heard new immigrants say that an immigrants' party is not needed because if things are good for Israel, they'll be good for olim; and if they're bad for Israel, they'll be bad for olim.

N.S.: I agree. One of our slogans is: 'The fate of Israel is the fate of aliyah.' But we believe that Israeli society is in crisis. We are not demanding anything special for olim in the changes we'd like to see in society. The economy, housing, the level of general and Jewish education and civil rights are all very important issues for the country. The fact that today this need for change is expressed through the immediate needs of Russian aliyah doesn't make our movement a Russian or new immigrant movement.

CJN: Do you think it's unfair that Israel Ba'Aliya been branded an "ethnic" party with narrow interests?

N.S.: It's a deliberate attempt by political parties to restrict our influence and marginalize us, and they will fail at this.

CJN: How will your party be any different from the religious parties which are perceived as special interest groups willing to vote any way in order to get funds for their own institutions?

N.S.: Not all the criticism of the religious parties is fair. They are no different than other interest groups like the kibbutzim or settlement movement. But I don't believe, nor does our electorate believe, that it is in our interest to get bigger mortgages by compromising our principles on security. Security is an important part of our vision and platform. We view our party as a tool to change society, rather than as a tool to get specific funds.

CJN: Many Russian immigrants feel that in order to integrate into Israel politically, they should vote for one of the two major parties. What percentage of the immigrant vote do you expect to get?

N.S.: Today we see that new immigrants are divided into three groups. About a third have already decided to vote for us; a third are undecided; and a third are divided between Likud and Labor with a slight advantage to Likud. We have very limited resources so we are concentrating on the first two groups.

CJN: Civil marriage, secular burial and public transportation on the Sabbath are a few of the items on your platform. Do you really believe you can pass legislation that constitutes a direct challenge to the religious status quo?

N.S.: We must draw attention to new realities and try to push leaders to do the things we think are logical. We want logic and harmony in our lives in a democratic and Jewish Israel.

CJN: You are regarded as a man of principles, a man of great integrity. Do you fear that you may lose that once you enter politics?

N.S.: I know that it will be very difficult. That was why I resisted entering politics for 10 years. But I came to the conclusion that there is no other way to influence the state. I'm sure that if the gulag didn't spoil me, neither will politics.

Israel & the Jewish World

Fundamentalists may affect election outcome

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

As odd as it may sound, Prime Minister Shimon Peres' fate in the May 29 Israeli general election is partially in the hands of Hamas and Hezbollah, the Islamic fundamentalist groups which oppose Israel's existence as well as the Oslo peace process.

Hamas can theoretically jeopardize Peres' chances of winning by carrying out more suicide bombings in the next two weeks. After the last wave of bombings in late February and early March, which claimed 59 victims, Peres' popularity ratings plummeted.

Peres also remembers that when Arab terrorists firebombed an Israeli bus near Jericho, killing three Israelis, the incident hardened public opinion and cost Peres the 1988 election.

Hezbollah, which recently agreed to a ceasefire ending 16 days of fighting in southern Lebanon and northern Israel, is in a similar position of strength.

If Hezbollah breaks the truce and fires more Katyushas into the Galilee, Israeli voters could decide that the government is not providing for their safety and punish Peres at the polls.

A consummate politician, Peres keenly appreciates the security concerns which animate Israelis. Indeed, several days before Israel launched Operation Grapes of Wrath on April 11, Peres accused Iran — Hezbollah's chief backer and an ardent foe of the peace process — of trying to bring down his government.

Cognizant of the external factors which impinge on the forthcoming election, Peres is doing his best to burnish his image as Mr. Security. In an intriguing reversal of roles, Peres is emphasizing security, while his Likud rival, Benjamin Netanyahu, is harping on peace.

In this respect, their main campaign slogans are revealing. The Labor party's slogan is "A Strong Israel With Peres," while the Likud's is "Peace With Security." As observers have noted, Peres is attempting to pull the ideological rug out from under Netanyahu, who at best is grudging in his support of the Oslo process. By the same token, Peres is attempting to convince the electorate that the peace process is paying tangible dividends and is worth pursuing.

Due to this strategy, Peres is about five percentage points ahead of Netanyahu at this point in the hotly-contested race.

In his quest to persuade Israelis that he is as tough as the late Yitzhak Rabin with regard to security, Peres has made a number of commitments and promises.

He has pledged that he will not sign final agreements with the Palestinians and Syria until the results of nation-wide referendums on the future of the West Bank and the Golan Heights are in. Critics on the right and the left claim that, with this tactic, Peres is deliberately fudging the issues and blurring the lines between the Labor party and Likud.

Peres, too, has said that the Jordan River will be Israel's "security border," and that the majority of Jewish settlements in the territories will remain under Israeli control.

The current status of Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital, he has said consistently, will not be altered. Peres' formula for Jerusalem is that it is "religiously open and politically closed." Peres, however, has ignored calls by the Likud to shut down Orient House, the Palestinians' headquarters in East Jerusalem, captured and annexed by Israel in 1967.

In a bid to woo religious Jews, the majority of whom are politically right-wing, Peres has promised further funds for religious education and housing. And he has pledged to preserve the status quo in religious matters, which favors Orthodox rather than Conservative and Reform Jews.

Yet for all his pandering to the right, Peres is working hard to consolidate and further the peace process which he and Rabin launched with the 1993 Declaration of Principles, signed by Israel and the PLO.

In a significant volte-face last month following the Palestine National Council's historic decision to revoke clauses in its covenant calling for Israel's destruction, the Labor party withdrew its opposition to a Palestinian state. In yet another move of great import, which may affect Israel's bilateral negotiations with Syria, the Labor party declared that the Golan Heights are no longer essential to Israel's security.

And with his recent state visits to Oman and Qatar, which have established formal relations with Israel, Peres has been able to show fickle voters that the peace process, however disrupted by terrorism, has been to Israel's advantage.

President Bill Clinton, who is firmly committed to the peace process, has used his office to help Peres. He visited Israel in the wake of the recent suicide bombings and announced a special program of aid. Then, on April 28, he promised Israel assistance in the joint development of a missile defence system against hostile ballistic missiles and Katyusha rockets.

These gestures may well be instrumental in catapulting Peres over the top.

IDF reports on Kana shelling

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The IDF has said that its final inquiry into the Kana shelling, which killed more than 100 Lebanese refugees, showed the tragedy happened because of miscalculations, but insisted the bombardment was necessary to halt mortar and Katyusha fire on an Israeli army unit.

Pointing to black-and-white aerial photographs of the Kana UN base before and after the IDF shelling, Deputy Chief of General Staff Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilna'i denied reported UN findings that the IDF knew civilians had sought refuge in the camp and had deliberately fired on them.

"We did not know there were refugees there," insisted Vilna'i. "We had no intention of hitting the UN camp. Hezbollah knew this and placed its mortar and Katyusha launcher very close to the camp."

The inquiry said one artillery battery fired 15 rounds at the Katyusha launcher, but most of the rounds hit an open field less than 100 metres from the target. A second battery also fired 15 rounds, but aimed at a mortar position, which the army said was from 250 metres to 290 metres from the camp.

This distance would normally be too close for approval to open fire, but OC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine said the order was given since it was a life-threatening situation.

"The commander on the ground reported that mortar shells were falling 40 metres from his men and getting closer," Levine said. "I sent those soldiers there and my first consideration was to bring them home safely – and we did."

The IDF inquiry was conducted by Chief Artillery Officer Brig.-Gen. Dan Harel. The initial version was rejected last week by Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, who sent it back for more details.

It came back with details of two mistakes which ultimately led to the direct hit on the refugees.

According to the inquiry, two shells hit structures on the UN base and up to five shells may have fallen within the perimeter.

The inquiry revealed that the IDF had miscalculated the exact place of the UN camp in Kana and had also failed to take into account its relatively large size, some 200 metres by 100 metres. This meant that the base was really less than 100 metres from the mortar. The 155-mm shells are considered deadly within a 500-metre radius.

Agency offices closed

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A flurry of diplomatic activity in Washington, Moscow and Jerusalem, as well as pressure from U.S. Jewish leaders, led the U.S. State Department last week to make a statement expressing concern over the closure of certain Jewish Agency centres in Russia.

At the same time, Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg arrived in New York for a 10-hour visit, during which he held intensive negotiations with some 15 Jewish leaders on strategies for dealing with the closure of the agency's offices in Birobidzhan and Piatrgorsk, regional headquarters for aliyah from the Caucasus.

Various contingency plans were reportedly discussed, including a concerted worldwide Jewish campaign, to make it possible for the agency to continue its aliyah operations in case the situation worsened.

Simultaneously, agency experts continued negotiations with officials of the Russian Justice Ministry on redefining the legal status of the Jewish Agency in that country, after being informed retroactively that on April 2 new laws made it imperative to apply for a different mandate.

The agency had been operating under a mandate granted in April 1992 to provide educational, religious, cultural and sports activities and facilities for Russian Jews, and permitting it to deal with emigration to Israel, including the transport of people and luggage. The mandate was for an indefinite period, but included a clause permitting its revocation by the Justice Ministry.

The negotiations are reportedly proceeding without any particular problems.

In Russia, emissaries are reportedly continuing with regular activities in the various agency centres – except for Piatrgorsk and Birobidzhan – albeit with an eye on the new laws. There were no immediate reports of a decrease in interest in aliyah nor of cancellation of agency activities and flights out of Russia.

Trusting Shimon Peres

By SUSAN HATTIS ROLEF
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The orientalist Prof. Yehoshua (Shuka) Porat, formerly a candidate on the Knesset list of Shinui and more recently a supporter of the Third Way, publicly announced last week he is going to vote for Benjamin Netanyahu for prime minister.

Opinion

Porat, who by no means can be described as a right- winger, does not trust Prime Minister Shimon Peres. He believes the Oslo process initiated by Yitzhak Rabin and Peres is basically wrong, endangers Israel's security and that Peres is not fit to negotiate peace with the Arabs.

He also agrees with MK Benny Begin's stance that the Palestinian promise to delete articles from the Palestine Covenant calling for Israel's liquidation is nothing but a hoax.

Since Porat is a serious academic who is well versed in Palestinian double-talk, his views carry weight. His bottom line is not that the peace process with the Palestinians should stop, only that someone much more prudent and responsible than Peres should conduct it. He is not certain that Netanyahu is the right man, but is willing to give him a chance.

This approach is legitimate, but not necessarily correct. Though the Palestinians, and particularly the PLO, deserve first prize for double-talk in the Middle East, the question to be asked is whether they have finally come to realize that the dream of Israel vanishing from the Middle East is no more realistic than the dream of many Israelis that the Palestinians should migrate to the 22 existing independent Arab states.

The answer to this is clear. There is no real reason to doubt that Palestinian leaders have come to accept the basic premise of the Oslo agreements: Israelis and Palestinians are either going to live together on the basis of mutual respect, or blow each other's brains out.

The argument that the Covenant's amendment is nothing but a hoax also seems to be based more on bias and dogma than reality.

To label Peres as irresponsible is unfair. He has never implemented anything that damages Israel's future and security, unless one rejects the basic premise upon which Labor's whole peace policy is based: that peace can only be achieved on the basis of Israeli withdrawal from most of the territories occupied by Israel in 1967.

But if Peres is irresponsible on this count, so was Menachem Begin, who agreed to return to Egypt the whole of the Sinai Peninsula.

Furthermore, the assumption that Netanyahu is more responsible than Peres does not seem to be based on anything more than wishful thinking and anti-Peres prejudice. It is difficult to understand how anyone can believe that Netanyahu, whose double-talk in the course of the current election campaign has turned into a systematic method, is more trustworthy than Peres. And, if one adds to this the fact that Netanyahu has added to his "military flank" ex-generals Ariel Sharon, Rafael Eitan and the politically inexperienced Yitzhak Mordechai, while Peres's retired generals are Ehud Barak, Ori Orr, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and Efraim Sneh, the argument that the former is more trustworthy than the latter becomes even harder to accept.

Clinton backs return of assets

By ALISSA KAPLAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – U.S. President Bill Clinton expressed his support last week for efforts to have Holocaust-era Jewish bank accounts in Switzerland returned to their rightful owners or their heirs.

Clinton's statement came the same day that Swiss banking officials and Jewish leaders penned an agreement in New York to create a committee to oversee the "unfettered" search for the World War II bank accounts of Holocaust victims.

"Our most recent conversation with regard to the return of Jewish assets in Swiss banks enjoys the support of this administration," Clinton wrote in a May 2 letter to Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress and one of the agreement's signatories.

Clinton also said the restitution effort "is a moral issue and a question of justice, and I hope you will keep me informed of your progress."

The aim of the understanding reached May 2 is to determine the whereabouts of money deposited in Switzerland by Jews during the World War II era. A related goal of the agreement is to uncover looted Jewish assets that were deposited into Nazi accounts.

Jewish Agency for Israel chair Avraham Burg, who came to New York for the signing of the agreement, called it "a breakthrough."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) commended the World Jewish Congress and the Swiss Bankers Association.

"The Swiss have taken an important begining step towards resolving this long-standing issue," said CJC national executive director Jack Silverstone.

The road that led to last week's agreement was sometimes bumpy, particularly when the Swiss Bankers Association announced in February that they had found 774 dormant accounts worth about $32 million (US), said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress.

Jewish organizations have claimed that the figure could be as high as several billion dollars.

The World Jewish Congress did not accept the "unilateral findings," because the process used to determine the numbers was not a "transparent" one, Steinberg said, adding that the move by the Swiss had been a "complete breach of understanding."

But the Swiss bankers agreed to "change their position" after hearings this month on the issue before a Senate committee, he said.

The independent commission established as a result of the agreement is made up of six people, three of whom represent the Jewish community and three who represent the Swiss Bankers Association. In addition, each side will have two alternate members.

Including Burg, the Jewish representatives are Shevach Weiss, speaker of the Knesset, and Ruben Beraja, an Argentine leader and member of the Latin American Jewish Congress.

The group will choose a chair and oversee independent auditors.

Swiss insurance companies and transfer agencies will also be searched for Jewish assets, said Steinberg, who called the new understanding an "excellent first step."

Family man Patinkin loves live concerts best

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Jeffrey Geiger may have turned in his operating room greens last fall, but New York-based actor Mandy Patinkin, who now portrays the troubled, multi-talented cardiac surgeon on an occasional basis, continues to delve wholeheartedly into the Chicago Hope role that won him an Emmy award last year.

During a recent phone interview, Patinkin, 43, described his visit that morning to a New York City hospital to learn first-hand about a program that brings "clown doctors" into the intensive care unit (ICU) — his research for last week's episode of the weekly hospital drama.

"I've been trying to get them to do this for a while. Have you heard of the Clown Care Unit of the Big Apple Circus? It's really extraordinary. They have clowns that go into the ICU and make these kids laugh," he said matter-of-factly.

His voice changed, becoming breathy and incredulous, when he recalled being "in the room with some kids who were dying and on respirators ... and all of a sudden after five minutes, this one kid just starts laughing. It was incredible."

The father of two children — Isaac, 13, and Gideon, 9, Patinkin left Chicago Hope to spend more time with them and his wife, actress-writer Kathryn Grody.

A week-long visit from his oldest son while he was taping in Los Angeles had been the final straw.

"To no one's ill intention, before we knew it, I was shooting five episodes at once, because this one needed to be rewritten, that one was late, and all of a sudden I was there 24 hours a day. When he left, we were both crying, and I just couldn't deal with it.

"Even if they moved the show to New York, I couldn't do a job where I would never be home for dinner, never be free for a weekend. I didn't know what the job would be like. I learned as I went along."

Although Chicago Hope was his first television series, bringing him to the attention of a wider audience, aficionados of live theatre have been familiar with his talent for a long time. In 1980, he won a Tony award for his Broadway debut as Che in Evita and he was nominated for his starring role in Sunday in the Park with George.

His dozen or so film roles included Avigdor in Barbra Streisand's Yentl and Inigo Montoya in The Princess Bride.

But doing live concerts gives him the most pleasure. Although his voice has been described by reviewers as "masterful" and exquisite," it's the spontaneity and interaction with the audience that he enjoys most. A December concert in Toronto was part of a North American tour.

Last month he left for London, England, to film Arthur Miller's Broken Glass, a Jewish-themed play set in 1939 Brooklyn. In it Patinkin plays a German-trained Jewish doctor who is naive about the Nazi threat.

"It's a tremendous juxtaposition of hope and reality," he said.

Violinist plays Gershwin on new album

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like father, like son. Lenny Solomon, 43, is a jazz violinist who still loves the classics, and his father, Stanley Solomon, 79, former principal viola player with the Toronto Symphony, loves the jazz his son plays.

'My father has always supported me,'' Lenny Solomon told The CJN recently. ''When I started out playing rock he'd come down to the club and cheer me on.''

Solomon has climbed well up the music ladder since then and has just returned from a 13-city U.S. tour. Next season, he'll do, a 35-city U.S. tour. His new album The Gershwin Sessions, with Canadian trumpeter Guido Basso, is a hit.

Jazz comes naturally to Lenny Solomon.

On May 29, he gives his second benefit concert for Israel's Nashim-Herzog Hospital at Inn on the Park.

Also performing at the concert are Quartetto Gelato, Mark DuBois and Maureen Forrester.

The night before, May 28, he is giving a benefit concert at the Ford Centre to support a program to teach fiddling to children of the Canadian Arctic.

''Jazz comes naturally to me, even though there are few jazz violinists in the world,'' he said. ''I'm flattered when people compare me to Stefan Grappelli, the world's most recorded jazz musician.''

Now a resident of Toronto's east end, Solomon attended Cedarvale Public School and Vaughan Road Collegiate. His oldest daughter, Eva, 13, celebrates her bat mitzvah May 18. Eva and her sister, Zoe, 10, attend Hebrew school at Congregation Habonim. His significant other, Wendy Tummon, is a classical cellist and they play together in string ensembles.

Music runs in the Solomon family — his sister Maribeth is a well-known film score writer.

Solomon's 130-year-old violin, which he bought in Toronto, was made in France. ''It's no Stradivarius, but I'm lucky to have it.''

His favorite piece of Gershwin music is A Foggy Day in London Town

Lazare-Mirvish exhibition

Toronto-based artist Anne Lazare-Mirvish is exhibiting her latest collection of abstract sculptures at Gallery One in Toronto until May 14.

"Anne's Recipes" features new works composed of pressed metals metals incorporating a variety of forms which are often highly textured and brightly colored.

"Anne's Recipes" is so called because as Lazare-Mirvish explains, "they have all kinds of ingredients," and embody so many ideas.

Patinkin trained in synagogue boys choir

Like his character in the film, he takes pride in his Jewishness. Mandel Bruce Patinkin received his early voice training as a young member of his Conservative synagogue's boys' choir in his native Chicago.

Following his bar mitzvah, however, he took a breather from things Jewish. "I never said I wasn't Jewish, but I certainly didn't pursue anything about it.

It wasn't until he met his wife in the late 1970s that he felt a strong need to "do something religious" to mirror the depth of his feelings. Having a Jewish wedding was important to him. With love, marriage and children, "my whole real life started [and] all my Judaism came rushing back," he said.

He is currently working on an album of Yiddish songs (this will be his ninth recording, his first in Yiddish), which he hopes to complete this year.

Although he doesn't speak Yiddish, he knows the meaning of every word he sings. He says he loves singing Yiddish songs "almost more than any other kind. Maybe it's genetic. It is a very powerful thing."

Musical comedy enlightening for the entire family

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's to be a first-ever family theatre night on May 16 for Stage Kids, when the troupe showcases this season's slam dunk musical mystery, The Player Principle, written by Rochelle Douris, produced and directed by Lisa Barnett and Barbara Onrot.

Stage Kids, founded nine years ago by Barnett, who also writes all scores and lyrics, is a not-for-profit charitable group that explores contemporary issues through live musical theatre for young audiences.

This season's regular performances for schoolchildren, scheduled in April and May at Minkler Auditorium, Heritage Theatre and Ryerson Theatre, are virtually sold out and will attract some 33,000 young people from as far afield as Oshawa, Oakville and Simcoe, as well as across Metro Toronto.

However, tickets are available for the evening family night performance at Ryerson Theatre.

At the outset, The Player Principle zeroes in on a tense moment just before Game 7 of the NBA finals between the Toronto Raptors and the Vancouver Grizzles.

J.J. Johnson, probably the ace player of all time and star centre for the Raptors, has disappeared! When team owner Darlene Ditove announces a delay, declaring that the game can't go on without him, rumors race through the crowd of devoted fans.

What is behind this no-show? Is foul play involved? Whodunnit — the owner, the team manager, the coach, a player? Everyone is suspect.

And the show does go on, but not as anticipated.

Players, arena staff and the crowd/audience, are all caught up in a farcical, musical, toe-tapping hunt for the missing man.

As they become involved, they begin to understand team spirit, conflict resolution and racism. They also realize that their heroes are only human.

The Player Principle brings together mom, dad and the kids in a magical, comical, enlightening experience.

For tickets to family theatre night on May 16, call 416-538-1345. Prices are $25 for adults, with free admission to children under 14 (up to three children admitted with every adult ticket purchased).

Prizes to be drawn during the event include a weekend for two at Pinehouse Inn and dinner for two at Aqua.

All proceeds from the evening will go to support Stage Kids and its future productions.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

JERUSALEM – "Welcome to Cardo Culineria," said Rafi Nahum, "the only Roman-Judean kosher restaurant in the world."

In this unique and atmospheric restaurant on the main street of Jerusalem's Old City, visitors are given a rousing welcome. In my case, while one attendant put a helmet on my head and handed me a golden shield, another pinned a purple toga around me and a third announced my arrival with a shofar-like flourish of an antiquated trumpet. At Cardo Culineria they treat you like Somebody.

The concept is simple: to reproduce a Judean dining experience from Roman times, 2, 000 years ago. " We were concerned that some religious people might not like the fact that we were opening a Roman-style restaurant," said Nahum, a co-owner of the establishment. "That's why we chose the Judean theme."

We were seated on a bench at a low table bearing dishes of olives and pickles. As a waiter-slave poured lemonade and served bowls of lentil soup with pita, Nahum explained that when the restaurant opened five years ago, the meals were completely loyal to the ancient palette.

"People said the food was 'different' – they didn't use the word 'tasty' – so we changed our recipes slightly to bring them more in line with modern tastes.

"We follow some basic principles. For instance we don't serve tomatoes, potatoes, corn, eggplant, Coke or other items we know did not exist here 2,000 years ago."

Lunch at Cardo Culineria is a relatively civilized affair. At dinnertime, the prix fixe menu also includes wine, dancing girls, jugglers and flame-throwers.

Reasonably priced, a meal at Cardo Culineria demonstrates the unsurpassed quality and variety of kosher dining in Israel. It also reflects a tourist infrastructure that characteristically offers the best of the ancient and modern worlds on a platter.

Cardio Culineria is under the supervision of the Rabbinical Council of Jerusalem.

Shortly after this unusual, lighthearted lunch, we stood at the entrance to the Western Wall tunnels. Cleared of tonnes of centuries-old debris, these recently-excavated passages run beneath the houses of the Muslim quarter, following the unexposed part of the Western Wall northward some 450 metres to the corner.

Opened only four years ago, the tunnel leads past a variety of subterranean halls, arches and other constructions of Byzantine and Mameluke origin, offering astonishing glimpses of the Second Temple's sturdy Herodian architecture. Deep below ground, it terminates in a section of Roman street, pillared and cobblestoned, that the ancient Israelites walked two millenia ago.

Conducted by a tour guide, one passes the Great Hall, which contains an excellent scale model of the Temple. At Wilson's Arch, once part of a royal bridge connecting King Herod's palace to the Temple, there is a fenced-off place of prayer from which the hallelujahs and lamentations of the pious reverberate.

This, ostensibly, is the synagogue closest to the Holy of Holies, Judaism's most sacred site.

The Great Stone is a massive block in the original Herodian wall, roughly four metres deep by 1.35 metres long; it weighs roughly 400 tonnes. No one knows how it was put in place. The Romans couldn't budge it when they brought down the Temple in 70CE.

Supposedly, the building of the Temple and the Temple Mount took a workforce of 10,000 professional builders, including 1,000 priests. One can only imagine their thoughts as they laid the foundations. Just as the visitor finds much excellent nourishment for the physical body in Israel, one finds much excellent sustenance for the soul as well.

Toronto Jewish Folk Choir: In celebration of its 70th anniversary, the choir performs both old and new music expressing the sorrows and joys of the Jewish experience through the ages, at an annual Spring Concert, May 26, 2:30 p.m. at Walter Hall, Edward Johnson Bldg., 80 Queen's Park Cres. (at Avenue Road), Toronto.

Soprano Claire Klein Osipov returns to Toronto from Vancouver to perform various selections, including the lead role in the folk operetta Tevye's Hodl by Maurice Rauch, based on the story by Sholom Aleichem. As well, the choir offers Reflections of Solomon, a new work by Alexander Rapoport.

Tickets (adults $15, seniors and students $12) are available at the door or in advance at Negev, Israel's and Matana Judaica bookstores and Lasting Impressions Photo. 416-489-7681 or 416-492-7110.

Toronto Yiddish Poet Honored: A literary musical evening honors 75-year-old Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch, May 21, 7:30 p.m. at Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst St., Toronto. The event features Yiddish writer and scholar Dr. Moshe Wolfe, Cantor Paul Kowarsky, storyteller and actor Nathan Garnick, Yiddish folksinger Jennie Eisenstein and others.

Simchovitch is the author of four poetry books in Yiddish, a scholarly monograph in Hebrew and a collection of English poems. His novel Stepchild on the Vistula appeared both in Yiddish and English and was hailed by critics as a genuine portrayal of pre-Holocaust Jewish life in Poland.

Sponsors include The Committee for Yiddish, the Yiddishe Kulture Geselshaft and Friends of Yiddish. Reception following. Admission free.

Theatrical Grab Bag: Herein, some news and notices from Toronto's theatre world.

• Livent Inc. recently announced that its musical adaptation of the E.L. Doctorow novel Ragtime, which has been in development for more than two years, premieres January 1997 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, North York, precisely three years after Livent chair and CEO Garth Drabinsky acquired the worldwide theatrical rights.

• After acquiring the rights last December for the "shocking" off-Broadway comedy Three Viewings by Jeffrey Hatcher, Torontonians Ben and Sylvia Lennick and their daughter Julie planned to play all three roles themselves. It was to be The Three Lennicks in Three Viewings. Alas, Ben died suddenly in January, but not before advising Sylvia to recast the play. Now with Paul Soles in Ben's role, Three Viewings runs May 14 to 19 at the Ford Centre Studio Theatre, North York.

• Avi Hoffman's hit musical Too Jewish? is in performance May 26 to 29 at the Leah Posluns Theatre, North York. Tickets available at Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave. W.; Lasting Impressions One-Hour Photo in Bathurst Manor Plaza; and Matana Judaica, 248 Steeles Ave., Unit 6, Thornhill. Hachoo! Oh no, it's allergy season again

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the late, lamented TV program Northern Exposure, one of the show's many offbeat characters took up residence in a plastic bubble to avoid an allergic reaction to environmental substances that could kill him.

In Seinfeld, Kramer was excited about the prospects of visiting "Bubble Boy," likewise someone forced to live in a bubble to avoid allergic reactions.

Those scenarios made for many comic moments, but in the real world, living with allergies is anything but funny.

Indeed, for some, allergies can be a matter of life and death — reactions to peanuts are one example — but in most cases, life-threatening situations are rare. Common reactions are either a mild case of eczema or hay fever that respond to conventional over the counter medication. Pollen, animal dander (dead skin cells), dust, some foods and animals are the principal culprits triggering allergic reactions.

"A person with allergies can't change her environment completely; she must learn to live in it; and with modern medicine, that is possible," write a quartet of practising allergists and a professional dietician.

The five, Dr. Barry Zimmerman, Dr. Milton Gold, Dr. Sasson Lavi, Dr. Stephen Feanny and Eleanor Brownridge, have recently updated an earlier book on allergies — just in time for the spring pollen season.

Titled The Canadian Allergy and Asthma Handbook, published by Random House Canada, the book provides the latest in avoidance strategies, medications and tips on how to cope with allergies, asthma and their complications.

One in five Canadians suffers from one form of allergy or another, while an estimated 35 million North Americans suffer from hay fever (allergy to airborne pollen). One million more experience a severe reaction to food and a further one million are dangerously allergic to insect stings, say materials provided by Random House.

The authors' look at allergies and asthma begins with a few definitions. Allergies, they note, represent an abnormal response by the immune system to an allergen, a protein in the environment. Allergens include things like dust particles, pollen and foods.

In somewhat technical language, they describe how the body reacts to invasion at the biochemical level and they point out that reaction is an inherited trait.

Interestingly, asthma and allergies are usually connected: "Mild, intermittent asthma, particularly in preschool children, often occurs without allergy, whereas chronic asthma is associated with allergy in 70 to 80 percent of children over the age of six."

The difficulty in breathing associated with asthma is due to a narrowing of airways to the lungs caused primarily by inflammation. Viral infections (colds), pollens, dust, animal dander, moulds, chemicals and tobacco smoke are primary causes of inflammation, they note.

While today many people are relying on "alternative" methods to treat allergies, the authors state emphatically that the best threatment is the aggressive use of prescribed medication to reduce inflammation coupled with environmental controls. By improving your personal environment, you can help reduce the amount of medication you need, they write.

Eliminating tobacco smoke and animal dander are usually good steps in combatting allergies and asthma. Other helpful tips:

- Keep the house clean and keep humidity down, to reduce levels of house dust, which contain dust mites, mould spores, dander and other debris.
- Dust mites love to live in carpets, particularly shag or wool ones. In some cases, you may have to remove them and keep the floor bare, which allows for better cleaning.
- Remove dust collectors like cork boards, pennants, mobiles and hanging plants.
- To keep dust mites and moulds from multiplying, keep the house temperature between 20 and 21 degrees celsius and the humidity between 25 and 40 percent (use dehumidifiers).
- Keep aquariums out of bedrooms.
- In some cases, you may have to remove animal pets from the house or keep them outside as much as possible.
- Use alternatives to chemical-containing household items like perfumes, insecticides, hairsprays, deodorants and cleaning agents.

Laniado nursing scholarships to honor Toronto couple

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Community leaders Dr. Laurie and Maxine Blendis are preparing to make aliyah this summer.

"A nursing scholarship will be established at Laniado honoring Laurie and Maxine," said David William Brown, chair of the Toronto Friends of Laniado Hospital.

"Laniado is a general hospital that serves the city of Netanya and the surrounding area, a population of more than 250,000," Maxine said.

"Despite inadequate funding, the hospital continues to do an incredible job and excelled itself following the Bet Lid bombing incident, despite the fact that its emergency department was totally overwhelmed. It also has state of the art departments including kidney dialysis and ophthalmology," she said.

"Above all, however," Laurie Blendis said, "is the commitment to the human side of medicine. The nursing department gives the highest possible level of caring and it is because of that, that we particularly wanted to be associated with this nursing scholarship."

From a small outpatient clinic in 1975, Laniado has grown to be a comprehensive medical centre, Brown said.

Located at Kiryat Sanz, a suburb of Netanya, Laniado is the only hospital in one of the fastest growing regions of Israel. Many of the nurses are graduates of the hospital's teaching facility, the Tessler School of Nursing.

More than 42,000 people are treated in the emergency department each year. There are 130 patient beds and a long-term care facility with an additional 72 beds.

To cope with increasing pressures, the hospital intends to expand, Brown said. "There are plans to double the capacity of the hospital which has departments of paediatrics, oncology, surgery and maternity, a cardiac unit and facilities to care for victims of terrorist attacks."

The Tessler School of Nursing was the first in Israel to create a retraining program for Russian immigrants and is one of Israel's finest nursing schools, Brown added.

"The Dr. Laurie and Maxine Blendis scholarship will enable a young nurse to receive full training and begin a lifetime of service," he said.

Blendis is a specialist in the research and treatment of liver disease. He was the recipient of the gold medal for outstanding achievement in Research and Science in Hepatology, awarded by the Canadian Liver Foundation. An active volunteer, he served as president of the Israel Medical Association's Canadian chapter.

Maxine, an artist and lecturer in Jewish and biblical art, is the founding chair of Amichai, an educational fund for Ethiopian Jewry, and she worked for Soviet Jewry and tutored the deaf.

The couple will be honored at a fundraising cruise and reception on May 12 aboard the Northern Spirit.

Leafs quiz helps Buds fans get over early exit

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alas, the Leafs have lost, are lost and are likely to be lost for some time to come.

But even as this disappointing season comes to a hasty end, those with Leafs' blue running through their veins can take solace from the following quiz based on Leafs' legerdemain from the past.

Based on information contained in Captains, Michael Ulmer's profile of nine men who have worn the "C" for the Buds, the quiz may help Leafs' fans get over a nasty period of hockey withdrawal.

Good luck.

1. What was "Hap" Day's given name?
2. Who did St. Louis Blues obtain when they traded Doug Gilmour to the Calgary Flames?
3. Who was the Leafs' coach in 1941-42 when they came back from a 3-0 deficit to beat Detroit in the Cup final? Who was the goalie?
4. Which Leafs captain served as a Tory MPP and Minister of Corrections?
5. Which Leaf is tops (lifetime) in goals and points?
6. Which captain once represented Canada at the Olympics and was Toronto's only first team all star centre?
7. Which two Leafs captains started their careers with Birmingham in the WHA as "Baby Bulls"?
8. Who captained the most Leafs Cup-winning teams and how many?
9. Who was the youngest-ever Leafs captain? How old?
10. Who hold the Leafs' record for most goals in a season? How many?
11. Who had a telephone installed on the Leafs bench so he could give instructions to the coach during games?
12. Who was on the Leafs' DAD line?

Answers ...

1. A custodian in his public school gave Clarence Day the nickname "Hap." During his 29 years of employment with the Leafs, Day served as captain, coach and general manager of the team. He began his career in the 1927-28 season and led the team to four Cup finals before retiring as a player after the 1936-37 campaign. He coached them from 1940-50, a decade in which they won five Stanley Cups.

2. Gilmour started his NHL career with the Blues but management felt compelled to trade him after nasty allegations of sexual assault were raised by the parents of a girl who babysat Gilmour's daughter. (No criminal charges were laid and civil suits in the case were eventually dropped.) Cliff Fletcher, then Flames' GM, gave up Mike Bullard, Craig Coxe and Tim Corkery to St. Louis for Gilmour, Mark Hunter, Steve Bozek and Michael Dark.

3. Hap Day coached the Leafs for that memorable comeback from a 3-0 deficit while Turk Broda tended the twine tent.

4. Syl Apps, considered by many the best captain — and most gentlemanly — the Leafs ever had, retired after the 1948 season. He won election for three terms as MPP for Kingston and the Islands beginning in 1963.

5. Darryl Sittler holds the Leafs record for goals (389) and points (916). Only George Armstrong, Tim Horton, Borje Salming, Dave Keon, Ron Ellis and Bob Pulford played more games for the Leafs.

6. Apps holds the distinction of being a former Olympian and Toronto's only first team all-star centre. Apps was a pole-vaulter in the 1936 Berlin Games as well as an Empire Games champion. He is the only person to be inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame, the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame and the Canadian Amateur Athletics Hall of Fame.

7. Rick Vaive and Rob Ramage, both Leafs captains, started their careers as Baby Bulls with Birmingham of the WHA. They were two of five underage juniors signed to play for John Bassett's team.

8. George Armstrong, the "Chief," captained four Cup-winning teams in 1962, '63, '64 and '67. He scored the empty net insurance goal that sealed the '67 Cup win over Montreal in Canada's centennial year. Overall, he had four 20-game years during his career, which lasted from 1950-51 to 1969-70, when he retired at age 40. He captained the Leafs for 12 years, from 1957-58 to 1968-69, the longest captain's tenure in NHL history. Detroit's Alex Delvecchio, Rangers' Bill Cook and Wayne Gretzky of Edmonton and Los Angeles are second with 11 seasons each.

9. Ted "Teeder" Kennedy was the youngest Leafs captain ever. He took over the C in 1948 at age 22. He arrived with the Leafs as a 17-year-old, playing the final two games of the 1942-43 season. Known as a fierce competitor who played his best hockey in the playoffs, Kennedy helped the Leafs win five Cups before retiring at the end of the 1956-57 season. For much of his career, Kennedy's right-winger was Howie "back 'er up" Meeker, TSN's colorful analyst.

10. Rick Vaive holds the Leafs record for most goals in a season with 54, scored in 1981-82. He went on to break the 50 goal mark for three consecutive seasons. During that run, only Gretzky and Mike Bossy scored more goals. Still, the Leafs missed the playoffs twice and exited after only one round the other year. Vaive is currently coach of South Carolina Stingrays of the East Coast Hockey League.

11. Conn Smythe installed a telephone on the bench to relay instructions to his coach, Hap Day. However, Day, who referred to Smythe as "Mussy," short for Mussolini, often ignored the calls. Smythe is known for coining the phrase, "If you can't beat 'em in the alley, you can't beat 'em on the ice."

Three friends to run Dunlace Park tennis

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jonathan Gladstone, Ricky Jacobs and Adam Fisher have found themselves summer jobs that must make them the envy of any red-blooded tennis enthusiast.

Together, the three amigos will run the tennis program at the Dunlace Park Tennis Club, an outdoor community centre in north Toronto a forehand volley south of the 401.

Certified tennis instructors all, the three are readying the club for the warm summer days ahead when young and old leave behind the sterile confines of indoor bubbles and take to the parklike setting of the Dunlace club.

"One of our main efforts and goals is in junior development," said Jacobs, 20, a former manager at the Banbury Tennis Club. "We're hoping to promote the game among young people."

The trio have drawn up schedules for a full range of recreational, social and competitive tennis matches on the club's three courts. Also on the agenda are instructional programs and a mid-summer tennis camp for kids.

In the spring, the club will hold after-school lessons for students, said Gladstone, 21, the head professional. The club will also offer group lessons, private instruction and adult games in the evenings. There are plans for eight, five-day afternoon camp sessions for juniors, aged 7 to 16, beginning on July 1 for $165 per week.

For the threesome, running the tennis program is their way of "giving back to the community," Gladstone said. "We love tennis, the community and junior development."

All three grew up playing tennis in similar clubs in the Bayview community. Gladstone, a third year science student at the University of Toronto, has been a certified instructor since he was 15. At age 17, he upgraded his Tennis Canada certification to Level 2 coach.

He has coached at 10 programs in Ontario including those run by the North York Tennis Association, the Tennis Group and the All-Canadian Academy at the Canadian National Tennis Centre at York University. He was the head professional at the Dunlace Club in 1993.

Jacobs, a first year student at York University, will serve as assistant head tennis professional. Jacobs recently completed his Level 2 coaching certification. He spent the last three years as manager at the Banbury Tennis Club.

Fisher, 19, is a Grade 13 student at York Mills Collegiate, the high school attended by all three tennis buddies.

The grandson of Alex Fisher ("Mr. Maccabi"), Adam was last year's Ontario high school tennis champion. Relying in large part on his 105 m.p.h. serve, he also won the North York Championships for juniors as well as 10 provincial tournaments. He was ranked in the top 15 in singles and top 10 in doubles. A certified Level 2 instructor, he (and Jacobs) have taught at the JCC Valley Tennis Club.

For more information about programs at the Dunlace Club, Gladstone can be reached at 416-445-8069.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I saw an advertisement on television about a medication management booklet. It interests me, because I take a bunch of medications and I have a hard time remembering the names of all of them. I usually bring all the containers of pills with me to the doctor, but it isn't a very efficient method, and I worry that if I suddenly had to go to the hospital by ambulance my pills might get left behind. Do you know anything about this medication management booklet?

M. K.

Dear M. K.,

Funny you should ask! The booklet you are referring to has been developed by the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada (PMAC). Jesse is actually promoting the use of the Medication Record booklet by seniors. The booklet is intended to be used as a communication tool between physicians, nurses, pharmacists and other health care professionals, in an attempt to reduce medication misadventuring.

It is suggested that a person bring the booklet to their pharmacist at every visit to have the pharmacist inscribe an updated account of all the prescription and non-prescription medicines that the individual takes. If you're taking a number of medications with complicated names, this is a convenient way of keeping track of them. It also allows for health care professionals to verify and monitor medications that could have negative side effects if taken together.

If you want your Medication Record booklet, please contact Jesse at 514-343-3795 in Montreal or call the PMAC 1-800-363-0203.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

FOR LESS

UNFRIED FRENCH FRIES

5 large baking potatoes light vetetable oil cooking spray
2 large egg whites
1 tblsp Cajun spice

Preheat oven to 400°. Slice each potato lengthwise into matchsticks. Coat baking sheet with vegetable oil spray. Combine egg whites and Cajun spice in bowl. Add matchstick potatoes and mix to coat. Pour coated potatoes onto prepared baking sheet and spread them out into single layer, leaving a little space between. Place baking sheet on bottom shelf of oven. Bake 40-45 mins., until fries are crispy, turning them every 6-8 mins. with a spatula so that they brown evenly. Serve immediately. Serves 4.

Jewish groups react calmly to FBI alert of possible attack

By LORI SILBERMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – American Jewish groups have vowed not to be intimidated by anonymous threats to kill 1,200 Jewish executives and doctors in the United States.

There is no undue "reason for alarm" at this time, said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

The conference and its member groups were already on alert after the militant Islamic groups Hamas and Hezbollah issued threats recently to strike at Jewish targets worldwide, Hoenlein said in an interview.

The FBI issued an alert to Jewish groups last Friday, after it received an anonymous threat to carry out attacks on Jewish leaders and doctors, unless Israel withdraws its military forces from Lebanon and pays $12 billion in compensation by May 5.

The threat was an apparent reference to the Israeli soldiers stationed in the security zone maintained by Israel in southern Lebanon and last month's 16-day assault against Hezbollah targets in Lebanon.

"There is no way to know at this time if the threat is real, but the FBI believes that Jewish organizations, synagogues and individuals should, for their own safety, be on heightened alert," the FBI reportedly said.

The threat came several days after a letter bomb exploded April 29 at the Jewish National Fund office in Calgary.

No one has claimed responsibility for that attack, which injured one person, but local police are investigating.

Hoenlein said Jewish groups must repudiated attempts to "hold us hostage," adding that government officials are efficiently handling the security concerns of Jewish organizations.

"We cannot allow ourselves to be intimidated" by fringe groups. To avoid attending public communal events, such as the May 12 Salute to Israel Parade in New York, would be a "victory for deranged people," he said.

The National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, while sending an advisory to its member agencies to be on alert, is also not trying "to be alarmist," according to Jerome Chanes, the council's co-director for domestic concerns.

While the threat apparently did not mention Israeli targets in the United States, Gideon Mark, consul for communication and public affairs at the Israeli Consulate in New York, said the American authorities "know how to deal with such threats."

Petition to try Abbas rejected by court

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - The High Court of Justice last week rejected without a hearing a petition demanding the trial of Achille Lauro hijacker Mohammed (Abu) Abbas, saying the petitioner, New York Assemblyman Dov Hikind, did not have standing in an Israeli court.

Justices Yitzhak Zamir, Shlomo Levine and Dorit Beinish explained that in general, petitioners who are not directly affected by a case derive standing from the general obligations of a civil servant toward the Israeli public. It is the court's job to see that these obligations are fulfilled. However, they said, it is not clear that an Israeli civil servant has any such obligations toward a foreigner.

"If somebody was not injured personally ... then who is he that he should come from abroad to demand, in an Israeli court, that a civil servant ... should do his duty in accordance with the laws of Israel?" they wrote.

The justices said the petition also failed to fulfil two other preconditions for a hearing: Hikind had not made the necessary effort to persuade the authorities to act before turning to the court, and the petition never addressed the question of to what degree Israeli law is applicable in the Palestinian autonomous region, where Abbas is now staying.

Abbas was involved in the 1985 hijacking of the cruise ship Achille Lauro. During the course of the hijacking, wheelchair-bound Leon Klinghoffer, an American Jew, was murdered, and Abbas was later convicted of murder in absentia by an Italian court.

However, he escaped to Yugoslavia before the trial, and Yugoslavia refused a U.S. request for his extradition. The United States later posted a $250,000 reward for any information leading to his arrest.

CHILDREN AROUND THE WORLD DRAW JERUSALEM. [Israel Museum]

"The reunification of Jerusalem in 1967 was the fulfillment of a dream for which the Jewish people had prayed for centuries. On June 7 we entered the Old City and were reunited with the symbol of Jewish yearning and prayer for two thousand years, the holiest site of the Jewish people, the Western Wall. This section of the western supporting wall of the Temple Mount has remained intact since the destruction of the Second Temple in the year 70 C.E. It is the most hallowed spot in Jewish religious and national consciousness and tradition by virtue of its proximity to the Western Wall of the Holy of Holies in the Temple, from which, according to Jewish tradition, the Divine Presence never departed." (Exerpted from an address to the general assembly to the United Nations by the former president of Israel, Chaim Herzog during his term as Ambassador to the UN, 1978)

You are our partners: Leah Rabin

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The State of Israel could "never, ever" have been created without the help of Diaspora Jews, and the country still needs their moral support, financial support and tourism, an impassioned Leah Rabin stressed last week at the Winter Garden Theatre.

"Don't ask, 'Is it safe to go to Israel?' Other countries aren't free of terrorism. You have to be a fatalist. I think, as Jewish people, it is your commitment to go to Israel even if at times you think it's not so safe. You are our partners, for better or for worse," she told a crowd of close to 1,000 people.

Rabin was keynote speaker at the dedication program of the Rabin Scholarship Fund for the Advancement of Peace, a project established by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) in memory of Yitzhak Rabin.

The train of peace that began with the rapprochement of Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat will continue to its final destination of peace, Leah Rabin said. "And this is a source of great hope." Beyond a distaste for war and a desire for peace, Israel is "always there for any humanitarian rescue mission, be it Rwanda, be it Serbia ... we're proud to do so when we claim only 50 years [of statehood]."

Leah Rabin

She spoke of Israel as a "model state" with its "melting pot society," respected universities and museums, theatres, philharmonic orchestra and opera house.

"We haven't come to Israel only to defend and struggle, but to live up to the standards that we would like to," she said.

"If someone dared to say to you, 'We can do without you. We don't need the money,' this is total nonsense. We are very grateful for your commitment and your sharing."

Also participating in the program were Toronto actress Vivian Reis, violinist Jacques Israelivitch and pianist Stephanie Sebastien, in a musical and poetic tribute to Yitzhak Rabin; co-chairs Halbert and Gold who respectively introduced and thanked the speaker; Henry Jackman, lieutenant governor of Ontario; and the Leo Baeck children's choir under the direction of Bryna Bruder.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Concern Over Memorial

MONTREAL – Canadian Jewish Congress officials recently met with officials in the Croation Embassy to express concern over reported plans by the Croation government to rebury Nazis, who were mass murderers of Jews during World War II, with their victims as a symbol of reconciliation.

UJA's Toll Free Line

TORONTO – The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has launched a toll free number in order to make it easier to reach anywhere in North America.

By dialing 1-888-635-2424 (CHAI), Jewish community members will be connected to the Toronto UJA Federation Hotline.

CJHS Meeting

MONTREAL – The Canadian Jewish Historical Society will hold its annual meeting June 2 to 3 at Brock University, St. Catherines, Ont. The meeting will mark 20 years since the founding of the society.

ISRAEL

Bonds Mission

JERUSALEM – More than 700 Israel Bond leaders from three continents came to Israel recently to join in a week-long celebration of Jerusalem 3000.

Scrolls and other artifacts pertaining to the families were placed in an Israel Bonds time capsule and buried in an area behind the King David Hotel overlooking the Old City. The capsule is to be opened in 180 years.

Delegates also helped inaugurate the new Manhat industrial park in Jerusalem.

Bright Lights

JERUSALEM – For the first time in history, hundreds of antique and biblical monuments of Jerusalem will be floodlit to the end of time.

The illuminations will reach a climax of prestige on June 24. At that point, the four kilometres of millenial Walls of the Old City will be illuminated by thousands of fires and lights tracing a circle of light in the heart of the city.

Literary Award

RAMAT GAN – The author Shulamit Lapid was recently awarded the Israel and Bertha Newman in Hebrew Literature for 1996. The $5,000 prize is awarded annually by the department of Hebrew literature and the Kurzeweil Institute of Bar-Ilan's faculty of Jewish studies.

Suicide Bombers

JERUSALEM – Palestinian security officials have asked Israel to help locate two Islamic militants from the Hebron area suspected of planning to sneak into Israel to carry out suicide attacks.

Eichmann Info Web Site

JERUSALEM – A new Internet data base offers a comprehensive review of the trial of Adolf Eichmann, one of the architects of Nazi Germany's Holocaust.

The Internet Web site can be accessed at http://www.snunit.k12.il.

WORLD

Costa Rica's Vote

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica – Israeli diplomats here have voiced concern about this Central American country's decision to approve a recent UN vote that criticized Israel's 16-day shelling campaign in Lebanon.

But even as the diplomats were questioning the Costa Rican vote, the government of Costa Rica made the surprise revelation last week that it was purchasing $4.6 million in arms from Israel.

Kosher Labelling Laws

WASHINGTON – Legislation pending in Congress to improve and streamline Federal Food and Drug Administration (FDA) regulations could undermine kosher labeling laws.

Orthodox groups are warning that provisions in the FDA reform legislation could make it more difficult for kosher consumers to verify the authenticity of kosher products.

RA Elects New President

KIAMESHA LAKE – Rabbi David L. Lieber of Los Angeles was elected as the new president of the Rabbinical Assembly(RA), the international body of 1,400 Conservative rabbis serving 1.5 million congregational members. The RA also elected for the first time a woman officer as secretary.

Neo-Nazis Rally

MOSCOW – Members of a neo-Nazi group burned Israeli and American flags during a rally in the centre of Moscow.

The rally, which came amid annual May Day celebrations and attracted about 100 demonstrators, was organized by the Russian National Union, a small but militant ultra-nationalist group.

South African Riot

JOHANNESBURG – An anti-Semitic demonstration by Muslim fundamentalists outside the Israeli Consulate in Cape Town turned violent when police, attempting to control the 500 protestors, were attacked with stones, bricks and iron rods.

Israeli flags, set afire by the demonstrators, were also hurled at police.

Wallenberg A U.S. Spy

WASHINGTON – Newly declassified CIA documents support long-standing claims that Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved thousands of Hungarian Jews from the Nazis, served as a spy for the United States and survived well beyond his disappearance in 1947.

Bone marrow clinics planned for Adam

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Adam Kruger is 9 years old, and loves watching wrestling on TV. So when a bone marrow screening clinic was being planned for him by his family, friends and synagogue, it seemed only appropriate to call the campaign Wrestling for Life.

Adam Kruger

Two clinics are planned, one on May 26, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Centennial Arena, hooking up with the UJA March for Israel, and one on May 30, from 1 to 9 p.m. at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

This week, a dinner is being held at Beth Tzedec to help raise funds for the testing, which will cost the family $50 per test.

Other fundraisers being planned are Cut for Adam, a hair-cutting event at the Ultimate Cut, 180 Steeles Ave. W.; Fann 590's Dilinger Makes Cents, a collection drop-off at retail stores across Metro; and A Night of Hope, at the Myth Restaurant, 417 Danforth Ave.

For two years, Adam has fought non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, a cancer of the lymph node system, his mother Judy told The CJN. An autologous bone marrow transplant (using his own bone marrow), chemotherapy and radiation have failed, and his doctors feel his only hope is for a transplant from someone of the same East European, Jewish background as his.

"Up to now, he has coped well physically, even dealing with losing his hair and mouth sores. But he doesn't recover as well each time."

He is justifiably angry at the hand fate has dealt him, Judy Kruger said. "He kept being told that his chances were good, but he

Ontario tax cut criticized

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Describing tax cuts in the Mike Harris budget as "the height of cynicism," Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter said recently that other government measures will result in a $500 annual net loss for those whose total family incomes are less than $50,000.

Since the Ontario government had to borrow $5 billion in order to make the tax cut, it is a case of bribing taxpayers with their own money, Kwinter said.

However this was denied by John Clement, parliamentary assistant to the minister of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation. "It's nonsense that tax cuts are being eaten up in user fees," said Clement.

The exchange took place at a Bernard Betel forum on the government's policies, attended by 200 seniors.

"It is the bank presidents and those earning more than $75,000 who will benefit from the tax cuts, which are a joke," said Kwinter, MPP for Wilson Heights.

Canadian law still applies

As this column is being written, Canadians await the outcome of the special meeting this past Monday of the cabinet of the Quebec government. Premier Lucien Bouchard called the meeting in response to the decision by the federal government to intervene in the legal challenge by Quebec lawyer Guy Bertrand to the central ideology of the PQ that merely a majority vote by Quebecers in a referendum in favor of separation automatically authorizes the province to separate from Canada.

The government of Quebec filed its own motion last month urging the court to dismiss Bertrand's case. It argues that Canadian law has no application to Quebec's right to separate or how it may choose to separate. To answer the argument of the PQ government, to assert that Canadian law is still the law of Quebec, the government of Canada is intervening too.

In truth, it had no choice. Once the PQ stated that Quebec's right to separate is based upon "fundamental democracy" – whatever that means – and beyond the reach of Canadian law, Ottawa had to respond to maintain the integrity of existing Canadian law, to champion the proposition that Canadian law still applies throughout all the provinces.

Bouchard has threatened to call an election over the matter. His cabinet minister for Intergovernmental Affairs Jacques Brassard has accused Ottawa of attacking Quebecers' "right to democratically decide their future." There is no truth in the accusation. In fact, the federal government has not filed any papers to support Bertrand. Its involvement is intended to challenge the PQ's assertion that Canadian law is of no consequence in the matter.

But Brassard's accusation did not simply stop at the untrue. The government of Quebec is carrying the rhetoric against the federal government to an even higher level. As reported in the Globe and Mail, "It is clear that for us democracy rules over constitutional provisions ... this issue is a matter for democracy to decide."

This too is a disingenuous argument. The constitutional law of Canada is the very spinal cord which has supported the democracy within which Quebecers have lived for almost 130 years. To cast it aside as legally irrelevant threatens to buckle the entire democratic structure.

Furthermore, as The CJN has pointed out in previous issues, the PQ is less loyal to the rules of democracy than it is to the nationalistic passions of the governing elite. A majority of the people of Quebec have already indicated, twice, their preference to remain in Canada. But obviously, for Bouchard and Brassard, this was the wrong majority.

I commend the federal government for deciding to intervene. Indeed, in its editorial last week, The CJN urged the government to do so. The government succinctly explained its position. "The Attorney General of Canada has a duty to uphold the role of the courts as defenders of the Constitution and the rule of law. The fact that one has a referendum doesn't mean that the Constitution doesn't exist any more."

I especially commend Minister of Justice Allan Rock for seeing clearly what is at stake and for acting decisively, boldly to protect it.

Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman teaches liturgy at Hebrew Union College in New York. He is a monthly contributor to the New York Jewish Week offering insight and comment on the parshah of the week. He has a uniquely lyrical and rhapsodic style of writing.

In his commentary on Parshat Emor, a difficult parshah dealing with the laws of ritual purity among the kohanim, he brings the following observation and wisdom on the beauty and the purpose of human life. It is too moving not to share with the readers of The CJN.

"What is a single lifetime, yours or mine?

"It is nothing, of course, but it is also everything. Nothing else can even approach it in terms of real worth. Like a work of art in the making, every human day is a brush stroke of goodness applied to the record of time. We may never see the picture completed, but our reward is in each brush stroke.

"The ultimate artistry is holiness in the face of mortality. The ultimate desecration is spiritual pollution by which we give up on the long run because the long run is longer than our paltry vision extends.

"The Torah asks us to see as God sees, into the long run, but to act as humans must, in the here and now, relishing the chance for holiness in every sunrise, every sunset and every moment in between."

CJC meets with Mushinski

TORONTO — Ontario Minister of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation Marilyn Mushinski told a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region delegation that her government, despite having to undertake a radical restructuring in the province, remains vitally concerned about racism and discrimination in Ontario.

Congress had raised the concern that "in time of economic retrenchment when peoples' futures are narrowed and insecurity is high, there is fertile ground for scapegoating and racism to flourish," said Manuel Prutschi, CJC Ontario region executive director.

During the meeting, CJC community relations chair Ellen Cole and national community relations director Bernie Farber discussed intergroup relations and reviewed an issue previously raised regarding the provincial government's funding ads in publications that apparently promote racism. Mushinski said the government is developing a statement of principle on this concern.

In her first official meeting with Congress, Mushinski expressed agreement with the CJC concerns. Pointing out that the provincial government is committed to getting its financial house in order, she declared that solutions would be found by rethinking existing policies. The government is looking for advice from Congress on policy development, she said.

The government plans to address anti-racism programs in the education system, systemic discrimination and the elimination of barriers to equal opportunity, Mushinski said.

CJC spoke to her about the coalition of provincial ethnocultural and faith groups convened by Congress, in partnership with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, to develop a common constructive response to the provincial government regarding the effect of its policies on the social safety net.

The delegation also included political liaison vice-chair Marlene Sklar. Accompanying Mushinski were Karen Cohl, assistant deputy minister, and Malka Rosenberg, a ministry anti-racism consultant.

Lebanon operation should hasten peace talks: MK

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's 16-day military operation in Lebanon, which ended recently with an American brokered ceasefire, will hasten the resumption of bilateral peace negotiations between Israel and Syria, says Yair Tsaban, the Israeli minister of immigrant absorption.

Tsaban, a former member of the Knesset's foreign affairs and security committee, predicted that the talks, broken off by Israel following a wave of suicide bombings in February and March, will resume after the May 29 Israeli election.

"Everyone understands that without Syria, there is no solution to the problem in Lebanon," he said in an interview at the Royal York Hotel in downtown Toronto.

A leader of the left-of-centre Meretz party, Tsaban said he believes that Syria will try to restrain Hezbollah from firing more Katyusha rockets into northern Israel. When Israel suspended negotiations with Syria in March, Prime Minister Shimon Peres said they would not be resumed unless Syria reined in Hezbollah.

Fresh from a ceremony in Ottawa, where he signed a memorandum of understanding with Citizenship and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard, Tsaban said that Syria is interested in a peace treaty with Israel.

"For Assad, it's a vital and urgent interest," he said, referring to President Hafez al-Assad of Syria.

Tsaban said that Israel's leadership generally accepts the necessity of recognizing Syria's sovereignty over the Golan Heights and making a substantial, though gradual, withdrawal from there.

Canada's Immigration Minister, Lucienne Robillard, and her Israeli counterpart, Yair Tsaban, recently signed a memorandum of understanding giving Israel membership in Canada's Metropolis Project.

Tsaban said he supports Peres' plan to "separate" Israel from the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israel's economy, he explained, should be less dependent on Palestinian workers. By the same token, Israel and the Palestinian self-rule areas should engage in economic cooperation.

Separation, he noted, will inevitably lead to a Palestinian state. At its convention last month, Meretz endorsed the concept of a demilitarized Palestinian state.

Meretz does not advocate a return to the pre-1967 borders, he said. Its platform envisages an Israeli withdrawal from all but six or seven percent of the West Bank and states that Israel's final frontiers should be determined on the basis of demographic and security considerations.

Tsaban urged the Palestine Authority, led by Yasser Arafat, to press forward with its ongoing campaign to contain Islamic fundamentalist terrorism. He said he agreed with Arafat's policy of isolating Islamic radicals and co-opting other "elements of Hamas" into the peace process.

Turning to his brief visit here, Tsaban said the memorandum of understanding he signed in Ottawa recently gives Israel membership in Canada's Metropolis Project, which studies the link between immigration and urbanization.

According to Tsaban, Israel is expecting the arrival of about 70,000 new immigrants this year, the vast majority from the former Soviet Union.

In the past six years, about 720,000 olim have settled in Israel, he said.

Tsaban revealed that his ministry is doing its utmost to integrate the country's 57,000 Ethiopian Jews, who face a myriad of serious problems. "It is a test of honor for our society."

The Ethiopians are being resettled all over Israel rather than in ethnic enclaves. And they are eligible for generous mortgages which largely take the form of outright grants.

After his retirement, Tsaban intends to write books about immigrant absorption, Jewish philosophy and the new millennium.

Tsaban, chair of Mapam, was instrumental in that Socialist party's decision to join with the Centre party and the Citizens Rights party to form Meretz prior to the 1992 election.

Community leaders slammed for criticizing Israeli policies

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The "hypocritical" stance of some Toronto community leaders who criticize the policies of the present Israeli government was deplored recently by Martin Lockshin, professor of humanities, York University.

"Many of our community leaders believe that they should be more anti-Arab than the government of Israel," he said.

These leaders formerly objected to any criticism of the previous Likud government by "left-wingers" said Lockshin at the Bernard Betel Centre, where he spoke on the topic Judaism, Politics and Freedom of Speech.

However, in a wide-ranging exchange of opinion with members of the audience of seniors, he said he has not made up his mind on the complex question of whether it is appropriate for people in the Diaspora or in Israel to criticize actions of the Israeli government. "I don't intend to solve this problem today," he said.

"Freedom of speech on this question is a red herring," he declared. "It is an empty phrase that has been used to justify the right of Ernest Zundel to deny the Holocaust."

Lockshin also criticized the tendency on the part of some people, especially in the Orthodox community, to criticize the actions of Israel's Labor government. "I go to an Orthodox shul and I know that people are eager to criticize."

Lockshin said he has never been a member of Peace Now.

You've Arranged Your Cemetery Plot. Now What?

The most expensive part of dying is normally the funeral, not the plot. Most people end up spending thousands of dollars, unnecessarily, at a time when they are most vulnerable.

Elaborate, expensive funerals are not part of Jewish tradition. To discuss pre-arranging a simple Jewish funeral call:

CJC opposes school prayer

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Any attempt to reintroduce religious prayer in the public school system will be opposed by the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, Manuel Prutschi, its executive director, told The CJN.

He was commenting on a private member's motion by Tory MPP Gary Stewart calling for this, approved by a 39-29 vote in the Ontario legislature May 8.

"Let's hope this is a one-day wonder," said Prutschi. He noted that Ontario courts have ruled against prayer and religious exercises in the classroom.

"This motion will be filed away, nothing will happen and we shouldn't raise alarm bells," David Rotenberg, a former member of the legislature, told the region's executive committee May 9.

The executive also wrestled with what Prutschi described as "a weightier matter," a proposal by the Metro Separate School Board that only Catholics be allowed to teach in Catholic schools, and that teachers in Separate schools follow a Catholic lifestyle outside the classroom.

The executive finally approved a motion by Jules Kronis to leave any action on this matter up to the region's officers. Seven members voted against it.

"It's a no-win situation, we should stay out of it," said Rotenberg of the "Catholic" issue.

Prutschi told The CJN that it is a complicated issue because on the one hand Jewish organizations are not in favor of discrimination against non-Catholics in hiring. They consider it a human rights matter. On the other hand Congress has argued in the Malcolm Ross case that, depending on the circumstances, a teacher's opinion (Holocaust denial) outside the classroom should bar him from teaching.

Consultations will be held with the federation and the Jewish Board of Education before the officers take any action on the issue said region chair Moshe Ronen.

The executive was briefed on both issues by Ed Morgan, its legal consultant. The proposal by the Metro Separate School Board was sent to Congress by the Ontario attorney general to see if Congress wants to intervene, Morgan said.

At the meeting, the executive approved the ground-breaking Canada-Israel-Jordan medical agreement, now awaiting ratification, and co-opted into the executive, Dr. Arnold Noyek, of Mount Sinai Hospital, initiator of the agreement. Ziad Malaw, a Canadian of Jordanian descent, and member of the Canadian Arab Network, attended the meeting, along with Philip G. Aber, president, JP Management Consulting.

The meeting was also told by Steven Shulman that three weeks before a letter bomb was sent to the Jewish National Fund (JNF) office in Calgary the Congress sent out a security alert that the danger level had increased because of the situation in Lebanon and activities of neo-Nazis in Canada. He urged executive members to take serious security measures at their buildings.

Bubis visits

A new book claiming that ordinary Germans were aware of the atrocities against Jews sparked a heated discussion after a presentation by Ignatz Bubis of Frankfurt, chair of German Jewish Council.

"I don't agree that Germans wanted to kill all Jews," Bubis told a questioner. "This I don't accept. Not everyone knew the total picture." But he said he agreed with the author's contention that more than a small group of Nazis were involved. "The way Goldhagen [Daniel Goldhagen, author of Hitler's Willing Executioners] is doing it is not the right way. He is not one of the best historians."

A small group of Holocaust survivors descended on Bubis after his talk to heatedly argue the question of German responsibility.

Bubis attended a recent meeting of the World Jewish Congress executive which approved an agreement with Swiss banks to open more than 700 accounts to inspection. The value of these accounts, with interest, is close to $500 million, he said. However, he doubted that the figure of 700 is high enough as in the two months before September 1939, 17,000 new accounts were opened in Switzerland from outside the country.

Judge withdraws from war crimes case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The presiding judge in a citizenship hearing involving three alleged Nazi war criminals has withdrawn from the case.

Associate Chief Justice James Jerome withdrew only days after defence lawyer Donald Bayne requested a stay of proceedings on the grounds there had been improper, behind the scenes contacts between Justice Department officials and the Federal Court.

The case, in which the government is ultimately seeking to deport Helmut Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johanne Dueck, is scheduled to go ahead on May 15 with a new judge.

The latest snafu in the ongoing saga of war crimes proceedings began when assistant deputy minister of justice Ted Thompson met with Chief Justice Julius Isaac to complain about the slow pace of proceedings in Jerome's court.

Isaac later met with Jerome and then told Thompson that proceedings would be speeded up.

That led to Bayne's motion for a stay of proceedings on the grounds "there [should be] no behind the scenes interference in ongoing litigation and that the independence of the judiciary and the impartiality of the court [should be] unquestioned."

The courts, and before them the Justice Department, have been criticized by the Jewish community for their tardiness in war crimes cases. Of six deportation cases launched in the last few years, only one is going ahead on the merits, involving Konrads Kalejs, a visitor to Canada. The others are bogged down over preliminary legal issues.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Steven Shulman said "we've always called for these cases to be heard in a fair and expeditious manner."

The cases are doubly important in that they send out a message to the war criminals of the world who want to seek a safe haven" in Canada, Shulman said.

Yom Yerushalayim

Twenty-nine years ago, the 28th day of Iyar, on the third day of the Six Day War, Jewish soldiers entered the Old City of Jerusalem, raced to the last standing remnant of the Holy Temple, and restored to the Jewish people what history, dispersion and powerlessness had denied them for 2,000 years: sovereignty over Judaism's holiest spot on earth.

That breathtaking, tearful day is now known and celebrated as Yom Yerushalayim. Since then, an entire generation has been born into a Jewish world for which sovereignty over Jerusalem and its everlasting unity are as normal and appropriate as sunrise in the morning.

But for some people, Jewish sovereignty over Jerusalem is both a religious dissonance and a political affront. With the beginning of "final status" discussions between Israel and the Palestinians, they are now marshalling their forces to turn back history's clock by 29 years. Every Jew, wherever he or she makes her home, must oppose them.

In this issue we carry an article by Shawn Cohen of the Washington Jewish Week, in which he writes of the recent creation by a group of Arab American organizations of a lobbying agency, cynically called the American Committee on Jerusalem (ACJ). The purpose of this committee is quite plainly to persuade Americans initially, but the western world ultimately, that Israel – the Jews – must not be allowed to retain control over Jerusalem.

Cleverly casting the Jewish claim to Jerusalem in language which evokes images of unfair advantage, Raafat Dajani, the coordinator of the ACJ is reported by Cohen as saying: "We believe strongly that there can be no monopoly on sovereignty over Jerusalem by either party, if there is to be a just and lasting peace." Dajani further plays upon the "fairness" image by speaking in terms of quid pro quo. "If Israel wants sovereignty over east Jerusalem Palestinians must have some sovereignty over west Jerusalem."

Then, having tilled with the plow of "fairness," of give and take, and of reasonableness, he cleverly but insidiously plants the seed into the soil of public opinion. "We're saying that Muslims, Christians and Palestinians have an equally valid claim, and in some cases longer historical and religious claims to Jerusalem than Jews."

This is a brazen distortion of history and of truth.

In our Passover issue this year, we wrote on this page that there will undoubtedly be a great deal of international pressure brought to bear on Israel to offer up some form of territorial, functional or political compromise on Jerusalem for the sake of Arab honor, Palestinian dignity and a "comprehensive peace" in the region. That pressure is starting to build.

The formation of the ACJ represents a significant change in lobbying tactics by the Arab American community. They are campaigning in the capital of the United States. They are targeting opinion makers and law makers, aiming their propaganda at that generation, both Jewish and non-Jewish which has grown up, as Abba Eban describes, not knowing the poignancy of Jewish sovereignty over an undivided Jerusalem. We can expect a similar change in lobbying tactics by the Canadian Arab community.

We in the Diaspora must be prepared to hear increasingly the irritating reverberations of this propaganda and to see increasingly that in many quarters it will find a ready and receptive audience. More important, we must be prepared to counter their distortions with fact. And when we do, it must with one non-partisan, ideologically united voice.

Both major parties in the upcoming Israeli election are committed to an undivided Jerusalem standing forever as the capital of the sovereign Jewish state. Whoever wins the election will therefore speak on behalf of the entire Jewish world on the issue of Jerusalem. As we celebrate Yom Yerushalayim tonight and tomorrow, we must remember this: only an undivided Jewish world will best be able to ensure an undivided Jerusalem.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

Says covenant change is a hoax

It should be clear by now, to all but the wilfully blind, that the so called "amending" of the PLO charter is a gigantic hoax.

The most charitable, though farfetched, explanation for the Israeli government's aquiescence to this charade is that Shimon Peres is incredibly naive or reckless. Otherwise why did he so hastily proclaim that the PLO has finally done what they have for so long promised to do (i.e. amend the charter), and hail it as "the most important event in the Middle East in the last 100 years?"

Another sinister, but more plausible explanation is that the script for this hoax was prepared by Peres (with perhaps some encouragement from President Bill Clinton).

Having linked the continuation of the peace process to the Palestine National Council's (PNC) scrapping the charter, or at the very least those clauses calling for Israel's destruction, and knowing full well that the PNC would not do so before the Israeli elections, they spoon-fed this face-saving formula to Yasser Arafat to get him (and themselves) of the hook.

The rewards to Arafat for this minimal gesture were immediate and gratifying. The Labor party, without confirming the authenticity of the PNC resolution, has dropped its opposition to a Palestinian state and Arafat was invited to the White House as an honored guest.

The disputed Arafat speech

I recently obtained a copy of The CJN (April 3) in which two pages covered the Stockholm speech given by Yasser Arafat. Since my name is mentioned in the article, I hope you will publish this letter on this timely subject.

The speech reached Shimon Peres by Feb. 6. The unbelievable embarrassment which this speech represented for Peres' presentation of Arafat as a "peace partner," made it pressing for him to undermine the report from Stockholm, either by denying that such a meeting ever took place, or by saying that no speech was given or that the speech had a different text.

This incident raises the question of journalistic responsibility. I am old enough to remember the world in 1939. Hitler ranted day after day how he would destroy the Jewish people. The Jewish establishment, in many countries, reacted by denying that Hitler "really meant it," and that he had to say those things to impress his SA and SS followers. The misjudgment of Hitler's intentions cost us several million lives.

In the case of past Arafat speeches, Peres and his supporters have claimed that he had to say these ferocious things to impress his extremist and terrorist followers in Gaza, Nablus and Ramallah. But the Stockholm speech was delivered secretly, in front of diplomats of various Arab countries whom Arafat did not have to impress. In fact, at least one of them was so shocked that he made sure the speech would be leaked to the outside world.

No revenge on families of suicide bombers

Your columnist Gidi Koren ("She-yisha'er benenu," CJN, April 25), suggests that the State of Israel might deter future suicide bomb attacks by executing the innocent relatives of suicide bombers. "It sounds terrible ... but it works." (my translation from the Hebrew)

The origins of the Mimouna

I want to thank the editors of The CJN for devoting an entire page to discussing the various origins of the Mimouna. The article affected me tremendously. I no longer see my family's folklore as simple traditions passed down from parents to children, but as important customs based on significant events which occurred many generations ago. As the article clearly showed, keeping customs is a way for Jews to commemorate and retain the various important events in our history.

A stranger may understand some customs as extremely odd or strange, such as keeping a lamb and killing it in the backyard, or a married woman taking off her ring in the candil on the evening of Rosh Chodesh Nissan and returning the next day to find an additional piece of jewelry. Indeed, these acts are deeply and spiritually rooted in our Jewish people's history in the desert. Minhagim are a way to never forget where we come from or what has happened to us.

Family's history parallels that of Jerusalem

By ETTA PRINCE GIBSON

Most Friday nights, Oren, a 17-year-old 12th grader, stays up late with his friends, visiting the trendy pubs and restaurants in Jerusalem's Nahalat Shiva neighborhood. As the music blares out from the discos and the night clubs, Oren and his friends pay little attention to the Jerusalem stones or the stories those stones could tell. As he walks down Rivlin Street, named for his great-great-great-grandfather Reb Hillel Rivlin, he rarely thinks about the history that is his family legacy.

Today, Nahalat Shiva is a far cry from the neighborhood established in 1860 by Oren's great-great-grandfather Reb Yosef (Yoshe) Rivlin, who, fired by religious fervor, messianic vision and nationalist dreams, had the courage to move outside the Old City walls.

In 1810, Reb Hillel Rivlin, at the behest of the Gaon of Vilna, the revered Jewish scholar and leader, left the safety of his home in Europe and settled in the Holy Land. Since then, the Rivlin family has played a central role in the growth of the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

Today the Rivlin family is the largest Ashkenazi family in Israel, quite possibly in the world, with a family tree that can be traced back 500 years to Vilna, Poland.

In the early 19th century, Jerusalem was an unimportant outpost of the Ottoman Empire, populated mostly by Sephardi Jews who traced their roots to the expulsion from Spain and spoke Spanolit, a Spanish-Jewish hybrid. Crowded into the dark alleyways of the walled Old City, in an area smaller than 850 dunams, the Jews, who numbered barely 2,500, suffered greatly from disease. In 1837, Reb Hillel Rivlin himself died of cholera.

By the mid-19th century, it was clear to the emerging Jewish leadership that solutions had to be found. The sons of the first settlers, among them Reb Hillel Rivlin's son, Rabbi Yoshe Rivlin began to weave bold and dangerous plans to settle outside the Old City walls. Earlier attempts had failed, as fear of marauders, murderers and thieves had driven the Jews back into the relative safety of the walls. But this new generation dreamed of new, safe and healthy neighborhoods.

In 1857, Reb Yoshe Rivlin founded the Company of the Builders of Jerusalem to purchase lands and build outside the Old City walls. Although "foreigners" were forbidden from purchasing land in the Ottoman Empire, Reb Yoshe and his company, supported by noted philanthropist Moses Montifiore, were able to purchase wheat fields about a mile outside the city gates. This was to become Nahalat Shiva (meaning the settlement of seven), the first Jewish neighborhood outside the walled city, composed of small, private homes centred around courtyards and wells.

In 1860, Reb Yoshe was the first to actually sleep in his home at night, although it was two more years before his wife and children agreed to spend the night there with him.

By 1873, several dozen families had joined him in the new neighborhood and with the building of ritual baths, synagogues, schools and other public buildings, observes Yocheved (Rivlin) Tzurieli, Reb Yoshe's granddaughter, more and more Jews joined them. Paths and roads began to connect the neighborhoods, easing the sense of isolation and exposure; a railroad linked Jerusalem to the coastal plain and the telegraph made communication possible. Jews began to work at new professions, seeking to improve their economic status. By the 1890s, Jews had become a majority in Jerusalem.

Reb Yoshe Rivlin continued his mission. He established at least seven additional neighborhoods, extending the boundaries of Jerusalem in all directions. By 1914, there were 22 Jewish neighborhoods, with more than 13,000 Jews living outside the Old City walls.

With the outbreak of World War I, many young men were conscripted into the Turkish army. Taxes were raised and services cut. Poverty, starvation and illness were rampant, affecting more than 80 percent of Jerusalem's Jews.

On Dec. 9, 1917, the Arab mayor of Jerusalem and a committee of dignitaries walked out to the western hills of the city and surrendered to the British conquerors. The 30-year British mandate had begun.

The British brought great changes to Jerusalem. In 1917, Jerusalem still had no tarred streets, but for the first time since the Crusades, Jerusalem was once again a capital city.

The Jewish community was changing too. Although a small group of ultra-Orthodox sought to maintain their traditional ways, the majority of the population became more modern and engaged in new professions. The focus of Jewish striving became political, not religious, as the Jews accorded national significance to the connection between the Jewish people and Jerusalem.

Jewish communal life centred around its neigborhoods, most of which were ethnically homogeneous.

David Rivlin, the youngest of Yoshe Rivlin's grandsons, was born in 1923 in the then-new neighborhood of Maskeret Moshe, in the area surrounding the Mahaneh Yehudah market. His sister Yocheved was born in 1935.

"The neighborhood — the sh'chunah — was the centre of our lives," Yocheved reminisces. "Each neighborhood was different. There were Ashkenazi, Yemenite and Sephardi neighborhoods; wealthier neighborhoods and poorer neighborhoods. But we all knew each other and there was no friction.

"In many ways," observes David, "we were the transitional generation. I went to a cheder (a traditional Jewish school) and my father was a chazzan. But I also received a secular education. My mother had 16 children, but my oldest brothers and sisters died of starvation and dysentery during World War I. We grew up between the wars. We knew the ways of the old community, but we were involved in the new. We spoke modern Hebrew and were proud of that, but we also knew Yiddish and even Spanolit. We were part of the emerging Jewish State and we were very aware of it."

Relations with their Arab neighbors were complex, David remembers. As Jews moved beyond the Old City walls, so too did the Arab population. As Jewish nationalism grew, so did Arab nationalism. On Feb. 20, 1920, six Jews were killed and more than 200 were wounded in the first hostile demonstration by Arab Jerusalemites. Jewish property was looted and plundered. A year later, five more Jews were killed and 40 wounded.

Periods of calm alternated with periods of hostility, especially during the riots of 1929 and 1936.

During World War II, Jerusalem was the centre of British activity in the Middle East. But as the war drew to its end, activity against the British increased, in an attempt to persuade the British to allow the establishment of a Jewish state.

The entire country was enlisted and many of the Rivlins joined the underground. A large stockpile of weapons was hidden in Yocheved and David's cellar and Yocheved remembers the day a secret meeting took place in her family's home. When the British came searching for weapons, Yocheved, only 14, hid hand grenades in her blouse. Only later did she discover that they had been primed.

On Nov. 29, 1947, the United Nations voted to partition the Land of Israel into Arab and Jewish states, and to internationalize Jerusalem. The Arab states rejected this plan and launched a full-scale attack against the infant state.

Jerusalem became a battle ground. On April 9, 1948, the Etzel and Lehi undergrounds captured the Arab village of Dir Yassin and murdered nearly 250 of its residents. On April 13, Arab irregulars ambushed a convoy of medical personnel; 78 people were murdered and dozens were wounded. Terrorism and revenge continued incessantly. Jerusalem was soon cut off from the rest of the country, surrounded by hostile Arab villages.

In 1948, the Old City fell to the Jordanians, and from 1948 to 1967, Jerusalem was a divided city. On Dec. 7, 1948, Jerusalem was formally declared Israel's capital, but Jerusalem had been depleted and wasted by the siege and the battles. In 1947, the Jewish population had reached nearly 100,000; by the war's end nearly one-quarter had left.

Gradually Jerusalem changed its physical appearance and its social character. In order to rebuild its population, many of the new immigrants who poured into Israel in its early years were sent to Jerusalem. Unesthetic housing projects were rapidly constructed to house the masses.

But on June 7, 1967, the third day of the Six Day War, Israeli forces captured the Old City and Jerusalem's fate changed again. Jews could again visit the holy sites, from which had been denied them for 19 years.

Jerusalem began to spread its wings. The municipal boundaries kept expending. Tourism blossmed and massive economic development was planned. Five new neighborhoods created territorial continuity and provided suburbs for the growing city.

Jerusalem has continued to grow and diversify. So too has the Rivlin family. Today, members of the family can be found in all walks of Israeli life. Some are ultra-Orthodox; most are secular. Liora Rivlin is a well-known actress; others are university professors and historians. Some, like David, are active in left-wing politics; others, including former member of Knesset Reuven Rivlin, have joined the right. Moshe Rivlin is chair of the Jewish National Fund; David Rivlin joined the Foreign Office and served as consul general in New York. Yocheved, who had lived in Tel Aviv for many years, returned to Rehavia, a wealthy Jerusalem neighborhood built in the 1930s. David and his family live in the garden neighborhood of Beit Hakerem, first established in the 1920s. David's children live in East Talpiot, one of the neighborhoods established after the Six Day War.

"How can my grandchildren understand how we grew up?" David Rivlin asks wistfully. "Children who do not know what it means to struggle, who do not remember a time of suffering, who do not commit themselves to a cause. We sang songs at night and we went for long walks; our grandchildren come home to their television. We dreamed of having the money to buy a radio; they boot up their computers."

"Our lives were so simple then," Yocheved adds. "Our expectations for ourselves were small, our hopes for our country were so great. We were involved, committed, aware of the unique role which Jewish history assigned to us. We saw ourselves as Zionists, but our children and grandchildren speak of the post-Zionist period."

Does history impart a special responsibility to members of such an illustrious family? David and Yocheved believe that they grew up with a commitment to serve the country, but Oren says, "The truth is, I like to go out with my friends, to feel like everyone else, too. I want to live now and in the future, not in the past."

Common Israeli wisdom has it that Jerusalemites are somehow different, attached to Jewish history in a way that is different from anywhere else. And everyone can identify a native Jerusalemite by his special pronounciation of some of the most common Hebrew words. Yocheved says she can't put her finger on it, but knows that Jerusalemites are special. David believes that Jerusalemites are different, less frenetic than their Tel Aviv counterparts, more thoughtful and restrained. Oren disagrees. "I don't see any difference between Jerusalemites and anybody else," he says categorically. Then he adds, "But I don't feel comfortable anywhere else. This is truly my home."

Playing Jewish geography in Africa

This summer I'll be travelling through Zimbabwe and Botswana in southern Africa. And in each new place that I visit, I will seek out the Jewish community.

By Viva Press

There's a game that has been played by Jews for generations as they migrated from one part of the world to the other and settled in all six continents. It is very easy to play. And I'm sure we've all played it at one time or another. It's usually played when travelling, but can be enlightening in any situation. I'm talking about Jewish geography.

We all like to feel welcome in a strange or new place. We like to feel part of a group. And Jewish geography does just that.

The game begins when one person asks the other person where she/he is from. It evolves into eager questioning about each person's friends and family in other parts of the world, where each of them went to school, where each of them worked and whether either of them has been to the place the questioner is from. Usually, a match is made. A friendship is forged, a feeling of belonging.

I will be playing the game this summer. And I'm sure I'll meet people who know my friends and family. I have always had success when playing this game in the past.

Last summer, while I was working in Israel, I treated myself to a four-day trip to Jordan. On the tour were two other Canadians. We were all single travellers.

Well, one of the Canadians was a Torontonian who, it turned out, knew my father; and the other Canadian, a Vancouverite, had gone through the same Young Judaea camp system as I had. We had a number of friends in common. Our bond was instant. We were Jews. We were Canadians. We knew the same people. We were friends. Simple.

It may seem that being in the Middle East guarantees a meeting of fellow Jews, since going to Israel has become a rite of passage for so many young Jews. But this game has worked in other places too.

When my family and I were in Ecuador in 1992, we went to the Ashkenazi synagogue in Quito. There we met the Jewish community and chatted with them over kiddush. As Jews, we were welcomed into their community. And needless to say, we were asked if we knew so-and-so in Toronto and somebody's second cousin in London, Ont.

Closer to home, the same Jewish welcome makes Halifax such a good place for me to go to school. One of my non-Jewish classmates who wanted to get together with me asked me what I was doing one Friday evening. I said I had been invited out for Shabbat dinner. She asked me how I knew the people to whom I was going, and when I told her I had only very recently met them at the Beth Israel Shul in Oxford Street, she was shocked that I was going to a "stranger's" house for a meal. A stranger? Well, yes, I had only just met them, but I never thought of them as strangers. They were Jews who had invited me to share in a Shabbat dinner. We had something in common.

Actually, a lot of my non-Jewish friends envy this relationship. They have told me that when they go to a new church, they do not feel as close to the community as I seem to be to the Jewish community in Halifax. They admire the phenomenon of Jews looking out for other Jews, that they welcome them into their community. I like it too.

As a backpacker, I find it can be trying to feel like the outsider all the time, the stranger. But whether I'm in Halifax or in Jerusalem, in Quito or in Harare, I know that if there is a Jewish community I will be welcomed. And so would you.

Searching for a new Jewish identity

Jewish survival is no longer a matter of overcoming external threats which aim to destroy us. It is a question of whether we want to perpetuate Judaism.

By Ilan Gewurz

Furthermore, modern Jewish identity is so diverse — Haredi, Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, New Age, Buddhist-Jews — that it is also a question of which Judaism is to be perpetuated. Do we need a common underlying identity that ties us all together? If so, one must ask what that common tie should be.

These are not new questions. In fact, they have challenged Jewish thinkers for centuries. Until the time of the emancipation of the Jews in the 18th century, society consisted of various group identities, of which Judaism was one. There may have been a lot of discussion on how to practise the religion, but there was little, if any, discussion about one's identity on the most fundamental level. With the age of Enlightenment in Europe, Jews were no longer forced to identify as Jews. Thus the question of why remain Jewish took on new significance.

It became a question of how to reconcile the "Jew" and the "human being," how to harmonize being Jewish with the accepted beliefs of the time. This question has remained with us until today. Jewish scholars have answered the question in a variety of different ways. In the last 100 years Zionism filled the identity void and enabled us to avoid truly dealing with the question. But as the external physical and philosophical threats begin to diminish, the question of what Judaism means and how to be simultaneously a Jew and a modern individual must be addressed once again.

Moses Mendelssohn was one of the first modern Jewish thinkers to attempt to define contemporary Jewish identity in such a way that it fit accepted Western European philosophy. Mendelssohn saw himself as a citizen of Europe, a German of the Mosaic persuasion. However, to reconcile himself with the prevailing concept of natural religion, Mendelssohn abandoned the idea of Judaism as divine revelation. He accepted Judaism as merely one way of expressing those truths which were universally accessible ("divine legislation"). In so doing, Mendelssohn failed to give a reason why, if truth is universal, one should bother to remain a Jew.

This question was addressed by many subsequent Jewish philosophers: from Simon Dubnow's explanation that Judaism is a spiritual nation which can exist dispersed among the countries of the world, to Nachman Syrkin's attempts to show non-Marxist socialism as the natural outgrowth of Jewish prophetic writings, they all addressed the place of the Jews in society.

In a way, Zionism was a response to the failure of philosophers to reconcile Judaism with modern society. If Jews could not be "normal" as individuals within their respective societies, perhaps they could return to their land and become a nation like any other. Achad Ha'am warned that a "home for the Jews" would not be enough to perpetuate the Jewish nation. He argued that what was needed was the revival of a Jewish national consensus achieved through the cultivation of Jewish cultural identity.

However, since Zionism and the Holocaust have served as the central elements of Jewish identity, the Jewish nation never did undergo a true cultural revival. Today, 50 years after the Holocaust, a generation that has never known any threat to its existence is being raised. As the unifying external enemy is no longer a threat, Jewish identity is again being called into question.

Judaism cannot be rationally explained in its entirety, and thus the question has always been and remains, whether one defines Jewish identity according to the values of the times or whether one accepts the values of the times only to the extent that they are in keeping with Judaism. Clearly, as assimilation and intermarriage show, we are choosing to embrace modern values rather than Jewish ones as our core identity.

If the Jewish people is to overcome this crisis of identity, it must undergo, as Achad Ha'am called for almost 100 years ago, a Jewish renewal, a Jewish renaissance in which Jewish national cultural identity is cultivated. What is most important is to overcome the ignorance that exists today. When Jews know enough and care enough to argue for or against their religion, then we will have overcome the danger of having chosen not to survive.

Who is a Jew?

From time to time, especially when elections in Israel are called, the question "Who is a Jew?" comes up. Both major parties woo the religious right and promise to encase its halachic interpretations in civil law.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Recently, I came across some material (courtesy of one of my faithful correspondents) which reminded me of the time when the Nazis, I'havdil, were greatly interested in our identity. They wanted to determine who was a Jew and to that end instituted a special department, entitled Federal Department for Genealogical Enquiry. Its task was to find out whether certain persons were or were not of Jewish descent, which meant having at least one Jewish grandparent.

When I still lived in Germany, we heard stories, about people whose names sounded Jewish but who claimed pure Aryan descent, and also of those who by fiat of the government were declared Aryans, even though everyone knew that they were not.

The most famous of these cases was that of a top civil servant and Air Force general, Erhard Milch, a Jew born in Wilhelmshaven in 1892. He was a close associate of his boss, Hermann Goering, who was quoted as having commented on the dubious background of Milch by saying: "I determine who is a Jew."

So how did Goering defend his friendship with Milch at a time when the identification of being Jewish was the same as condemning one to the sub-human species?

Apparently, the issue became so much talked about that Adolf Hitler himself entered the fray. He yielded to Goering's wish to maintain the services of Milch and issued a ruling that all children of the Milch family had been adopted and were not born of Jewish parents. A deceased Aryan by the name of Karl Brauer was entered into the official lists as the natural father of the Milch children and all records were altered accordingly. My correspondent was good enough to send me a photocopy of the letter, apparently signed by Goering himself (although the signature cannot be identified securely). It was written on Aug. 7, 1935, to the chair of the department who was entrusted with the task of ferreting out genealogical data — and thus Milch was officially "cleansed" of his Jewish blood.

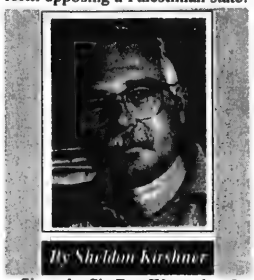
When in 1936 the Olympic Games were played in Berlin — with Jesse Owens, famed black American sprinter winning the 100-metre run — the Germans needed every good athlete to represent them so that they could gain some medals for the Reich. They picked out two Jewish women who were likely to do well, and in fact at least one of them did mount the podium. (She later immigrated to the United States.)

Unfortunately, these shenanigans had one dark side: they encouraged a number of German Jews to hope that the Nazis were not really serious about their racial meshuggas. As we learned later, their racial madness was in fact their most virulent disease. Even in the latter stages of World War II, when every railroad car was needed at the front, many were commandeered to transport Jews to Auschwitz.

The Kirshner File

Two-state solution gains legitimacy

A taboo in Israeli politics was broken last month when the Labor party dropped a clause in its election platform opposing a Palestinian state.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Since the Six Day War, when Israel captured the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Israeli conventional wisdom had held that a Palestinian state was unacceptable because it would compromise Israel's security.

And while the Israeli right still hews to this article of faith, the formula is no longer considered realistic or desirable by others in the era of the Oslo peace process.

For a long time, the leaders of the Labor party resolutely refused to recognize Palestinian nationalism, much less the PLO, citing Palestinian extremism and terrorism. Golda Meir, the former prime minister, even doubted the existence of a Palestinian nation. And until Israel's peace treaty with Jordan in 1994, Labor leaders promoted the "Jordanian option," the concept that a Palestinian state could only be feasible in Jordan.

But as the PLO gradually moderated its positions in response to the intifadah, the defeat of Iraq in the Gulf War and the dissolution of the Soviet Union, the Labor party was forced to consider a two-state solution to the Arab-Israeli disupte.

With the Oslo peace process, and particularly with its second phase, the Israeli government recognized that a genie had been let out of the bottle. As Environment Minister Yossi Sarid put it following the signing of Oslo 2 last September: "This agreement makes the establishment of a Palestinian state inevitable ..."

Members of Israel's elite — from Rafael Eitan, the leader of the far-right Tsomet party, to Teddy Kollek, the former mayor of Jerusalem — basically agree with this assessment.

And many ordinary Israelis think so too. According to a recent survey conducted by Bar-Ilan University and the Centre for Palestinian Research and Studies, 39 percent of the respondents believe that a Palestinian state will emerge in Judea and Samaria within five or 10 years.

The Palestinian leadership is convinced that statehood is just around the corner. "It is coming," said Yasser Arafat, chair of the PLO and president of the Palestine Authority, following his recent meeting with President Bill Clinton at the White House. "No one can hide the sun with his fingers."

Yet, as early as several months ago, Peres laughed off Palestinian nationalist aspirations as "a dream," while Foreign Minister Ehud Barak advised the Labor party not to alter its platform.

But in the face of contrary demands from Labor's rank and file and from its secretary-general, Nissim Zvilli, the party adopted a new policy. (The late Yitzhak Rabin more or less tried to preserve the status quo when he offered the Palestinians a state in Gaza, provided they jettisoned their demand for control over the West Bank.)

The Palestinians, having rejected Rabin's proposal, are moving inexorably toward statehood. As of this moment, they already have an embryonic state in parts of the West Bank and Gaza.

They possess a legislative council, albeit with limited powers. The Palestine Authority has issued postage stamps and intends to print its own currency within a year. Furthermore, Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza are able to travel with their own passports.

And now, with final status talks having begun, the Palestinians are well on their way to fulfilling their national dreams.

Roots of conflict

At the core of the Arab-Israeli dispute is the epic struggle waged by Zionism and Palestinian nationalism since the late 19th century. True, Israel and its Arab neighbors have fought several wars since 1948. But the Palestinian question, which is daunting in its complexities, predates these armed confrontations.

For a deeper understanding of its dynamics, a reader should consult three recently published books well worth reading.

They are A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict (Indiana University Press, $27.50 US) by Mark Tessler; Palestinians: The Making of a People (Harvard University Press, $16.95 US) by Baruch Kimmerling and Joel Migdal; and The Roots of Separation in Palestine: British Economic Policy, 1920-1929 (Syracuse University Press, $39.95 US) by Barbara Smith.

Tessler traces the roots of the conflict and probes its explosive manifestations. In his view, explicit anti-Zionism in the Palestinian community emerged just before World War I. Until then, he argues, there were instances of dialogue, cooperation and a recognition of mutual interests.

In the final analysis, the two movements proved incompatible, the main sources of tension being Jewish immigration and Jewish land purchases.

The Palestinians consistently feared that they would be swamped by a Jewish majority. Indeed, as Kimmerling and Migdal write, Zionist leaders spoke openly of bringing four to five million Jews to Palestine. Palestinian merchants in particular opposed aliyah. They were afraid that Jewish businessmen would dominate the economy.

Under the Ottoman Turks, Jewish immigration was strictly limited. But with the advent of the British mandate in the 1920s, restrictions were loosened, writes Smith.

The purchase of land by Zionists was not extensive — not more than six per cent by 1947. However, a substantial number of Palestinian peasants were displaced by these transfers, exacerbating Arab suspicions of Zionism.

A related problem, turning on the reluctance of Jewish employers to hire Arabs because they were loath to exploit cheap Arab labor, only heightened the tension.

Kimmerling and Migdal credit Haj Amin al-Husseini — the president of the Supreme Muslim Council — with placing the Palestinian question at the centre of universal Islamic concerns. But Tessler adds that Christian Arabs were the chief ideologues of anti-Zionism.

Interestingly enough, many Zionist luminaries underestimated the depth of Palestinian grievances and the strength of Arab nationalism. They were convinced that the Palestinians would learn to value the benefits of Zionism.

Eventually, the Zionists formed a keen appreciation of Palestinian hostility. Nevertheless, the Zionist elite misread the 1936-39 Arab revolt in Palestine, which, Kimmerling and Migdal observe, heralded the emergence of a full-blown Palestinian national movement.

One last point. It's now clear that the Palestinians could have attained statehood had they accepted the United Nations' 1947 partition plan. Being myopic, they spurned the scheme. Their rejection touched off a new round of fighting which turned tens of thousands of Palestinians into refugees.

Arms and the man

The international arms trade is booming. It does not bode well for peace and security, either in the Middle East or elsewhere.

According to William Keller in Arm in Arm (HarperCollins, $35), a trenchant analysis of this phenomenon, the post-Cold War period is becoming ever more dangerous. He is particularly concerned by several developments:

•The virtually uncontrolled transfer of potent weaponry by developed countries to the Third World.

•The formation of business alliances among arms manufacturers of different nations.

•The trend to adapt advanced civil technology to military purposes.

•The emphasis on economic considerations, rather than national security, to sell arms.

Iraq and Iran, both of which have roiled the waters in the Persian Gulf and beyond, prove Keller's thesis.

From 1981 to 1988, Iraq and Iran turned to outside powers to equip their armed forces. Iraq purchased military equipment worth $61 billion, while Iran imported weapon systems valued at $19 billion. The principal purveyors were the Soviet Union, France, China and Germany.

By now, we know that these sales ultimately destabilized the region and emboldened Saddam Hussein — the Iraqi strongman — to strike Kuwait, with all the attendant consequences.

Read Arm in Arm and shudder.

Book of Ruth speaks to women

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

The Book of Ruth, which is studied and read on Shavuot, is a text that speaks particularly to women. Although there are many central themes within the text, one of the central figures, Naomi, depicts a woman with whom women of today can easily relate.

At the beginning of the story, Naomi moves with her husband and her two sons from Israel to the land of Moab, where the sons marry Moabite women. Through tragic circumstances, Naomi's family dies and she is left alone with her daughters-in-law.

Ruth, the daughter-in-law who remains with Naomi, proclaims her allegiance to Naomi, her people and her God. The special bond between these two women unfolds when they return to Israel.

However, the story also tells the reader how Naomi responds to an intensely shattering crisis.

Naomi's husband and two sons are killed early in the book. Although devastated, only once does Naomi offer the readers a glimpse of her inner thoughts. Before returning to Israel, Naomi attempts to persuade her daughters-in-law not to accompany her, "because the Lord has extended His hand against me."

Naomi perceives the loss of her family and her own survival as a message from God against her. Surely she must be to blame for the suffering she must bear.

This response does not reveal much, until one compares Naomi's situation with a similar situation that befalls another biblical character — Job. The Book of Job tells the story of a righteous man who loses everything. Job also survives the deaths of his children. His friends gather in an attempt to find meaning in the tragedy and they suggest to him that he is somehow to blame for his misfortune. Job rejects this suggestion time and again and seeks other explanations.

Both Naomi and Job must face the loss of their families, but their responses are completely opposite. Perhaps one can learn from these differences. The loss of a spouse, though tragic, is not as unnatural as the loss of one's children. Job responds to the loss of his children with a male response — the reason must lie in the world at large. Naomi responds to the loss of her children by internalizing the blame — she holds herself responsible. Women throughout time have reacted in precisely this fashion.

Even a woman dealing with the loss of a pregnancy will react in this way. The doctor may assure the woman that she has done nothing wrong, and yet she will disregard his words and continue to blame herself for the loss of the unborn child.

Commentaries on the book of Ruth blame the death of the men on their having left their home and their people and taken foreign brides. These male commentators use the reasoning of Job. Yet every woman who reads the Book of Ruth can understand Naomi's pain; it is the pain of the mother whose children are torn from her arms; it is the pain of the survivor.

Lost in Last Respects - by Solly Kaplinski

I went to pay my last respects to light candles to mourn a member of my external family
Yitzchak.

First to Kikar Rabin where it happened and then to Har Herzl
where he rests.

The Kotel at the square is an open sore filled with pain and anger and anguish and grief
a raw wound publicly exposed for all to see a Kotel that wails with family tears.

On the cold wet slab of concrete where his dying breath is engraved as I lit candles and stood dumbstruck
I saw my father on his death bed and I cried
I saw Cain slaughter Abel and I trembled
I saw a son murder his father and I screamed
I saw beating hearts throbbing and pulsating torn out his, mine, yours and ours gorged with blood and I broke down.

At the Kever
in Jerusalem at dusk
I also light candles.
Teenagers sit quietly staring at the flickering flames writing with dripping hot wax Abba Yitzchak,
we long for you.

The Kikar Kotel — how different from the Jerusalem
Kotel — with organized minyanim and prescribed prayers for past sorrows present promises
and future glories in the world to come and crumpled notes stuffed into narrow spaces —
private, personal, silent and closed.

Let's suppose we could join these two walls.
Humor me for a moment
even if you tell me that cursive +script
=gibberish let's lift up these walls and place them side-by-side to form a square or a rectangle.
How then do we fill the spaces in between?
And even if we could how do we pierce the walls that surround the heart?
How do we gently lower the drawbridge across the moat?
One doesn't need a doctor to tell us that If we push too hard we kill the patient.

These walls can't fit!
Can the cool and shimmering sweet waters huggingly caress the heat-baked bloody clay?
Does the taste of soil
quench a hungry appetite?
Can it sustain a life-support system?

How about a different strategy?
Let's place the walls on top of each other.
Maybe if we build upwards ...
Sound familiar?

So do we start all over again?
Is this how it all ends?
Dust to dust?

And still they come
And still they write
And still they light candles
And still they stand in silence
And still they place stones
And still they mourn for Yitzchak for themselves for us.

Will it ever end?

Only if people who speak different languages people who tell different stories people who write different autobiographies people who live different histories people who sing different songs
and people who pray different prayers say out loud and with conviction

You are my brother and I love you.

Jewish Life

Of censuses, cemeteries and social notices

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Guelph resident Glen Eker, a freelance writer and former college professor, was thrilled several years ago when he found a listing for his great-grandfather Reuben Eker and family in the census for Glace Bay, N.S. for 1901, the latest census that is available to the public.

The census listed Eker's great-grandparents and five children, the age (but not birthplace) of each, and the year – 1900 – in which they had immigrated to Canada. "We found a sister in there that we didn't know anything about," said Eker, who had already known that his ancestors came from Tolchin, Ukraine. Excited, he began to search the entire Nova Scotia census for other families with the surname Eker.

Although he did not find any potential relatives, Eker, assisted by Torontonian Deborah Pekilis, soon compiled a list of all the Jews living in the Maritimes in 1901. That census, like most of its predecessors, had columns for Religion and Racial Origin in which Jews are variously indicated as Hebrew, Israelite, Jewish, Juif, Mosaic, and in one case as Sons of Benjamin.

Finding a publisher for the Maritimes list inspired Eker to continue his research. Spending countless hours turning the spindles of microfilm readers, he has since examined nearly every Canadian and pre-Confederation census in existence. So far, he has published microfiche lists of the Jews of Toronto from 1861 to 1901; the Jews of the Maritimes from 1871 to 1901; the Jews of Montreal and Quebec City from 1871 to 1901; the Jews of the rest of Quebec from 1871 to 1901; the Jews of Western Canada from 1870 to 1901; and several others.

Most Jews in 19th-century Canada had trade-oriented occupations – "tailors, cigar- makers and merchants," Eker observed. "There was a small number of professionals and a few newspaper editors, but the majority were traders and merchants."

Very often, the running tallies supplied by Statistics Canada of Jews and other groups were inaccurate, according to Eker. For instance, the tallies in the 1861 census for Upper Canada showed some 200 Jews in Blenheim, a town in the Tillsonburg-London-Windsor area of southwestern Ontario. However, no Jews are shown in the census for this area, said Eker, who regards the missing Blenheim Jews as the largest enigma of his four years of research. His most exciting find: a large Hebrew-Métis family in Manitoba that apparently dates back to about 1780.

Raymond Whitzman of Montreal was also looking for relatives when he decided to transcribe most of the Jewish cemeteries of eastern Canada, excluding Montreal. In the course of researching his family tree – a decade-long pursuit that has yielded more than 6,000 names – Whitzman discovered that many Jews who settled in Atlantic Canada, including his ancestors, originated in and around the Lithuanian town of Dorbyan (Darbenai on modern maps).

Whitzman has transcribed Jewish cemeteries in Quebec City, Sherbrooke and Ste. Sophie, a former Jewish farming district, in Quebec; and in St. John's, Moncton, Fredericton, St. John, Yarmouth, Glace Bay, Sydney and Halifax in Atlantic Canada. He estimates that he has transcribed about 1,500 tombstones in Quebec and another 2,000 in the Maritimes. To contact Whitzman, phone 514-489-4094 or e-mail whitz@cam.com.

Lawrence Tapper, an archivist at the National Archives in Ottawa, may also have been looking for relatives when he indexed all surname references from the social notices of an early Anglo-Jewish newpaper, the Canadian Jewish Times, that was published in Montreal between 1897 and 1914. Only half of Tapper's work has appeared in print so far: it is the fascinating and useful Biographical Dictionary of Canadian Jewry, 1909-1914 (Avotaynu, 1993). The volume has great worth for genealogists researching Jewish families that were already assimilated into English-speaking society here by 1909.

Eker's microfiched census lists or Tapper's Biographical Dictionary are included in the holdings of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada which are available in most major libraries. (To purchase either resource, phone 1-800-AVOT-AYNU.)

There's usually a genealogist in every Jewish family. If that person is you, you may wish to exchange ideas and information by joining a Jewish genealogical society. Contact your local Federation for the address or phone number of any of the five societies in Canada, in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver. They are part of a growing network of more than 60 societies in North and South America, Europe, England, Australia and Israel.

Yom Yerushalayim

Today we are celebrating Yom Yerushalayim, the day 29 years ago that Jerusalem was miraculously returned to Jewish hands. Jerusalem Day this year is followed by Shabbat Parshah Bamidbar (The Wilderness). The coupling of these two days reflects the reality that we are still in a spiritual desert. Our existence is still barren, with sparse growth. Even in our joy we are incomplete. We have a Jerusalem, yet each groom still smashes a glass at the conclusion of the wedding ceremony, and recites "If I forget you O Jerusalem."

Even with a united Jerusalem, we are still a desert. And we will remain there until we have completed the rebuilding of The Divine Palace, our Third Temple. How can we find our way out of this desert?

A few ideas suggest a route. First, "Jerusalem" is composed of two Hebrew words yiru and shalem. Yiru means "they will see," and shalem means "perfection" or "concord" (peace). The city was established to be a place of spiritual perfection and virtue. Of Jerusalem it is said, "Tzedek (righteousness) lodged in her." (Isaiah 1:21). One feels more righteous within the precincts of Jerusalem.

Second, we know that medieval maps were drawn with Jerusalem in their centres; Jerusalem was considered the centre of the world. Today our prayers are offered in the direction of Jerusalem and ascend to heaven through the "Gates of Heaven," from the site of the Temple in Jerusalem. (Genesis 28:17)

Third, Jerusalem belongs to every Jew. For example, the rule that "the poor of your city take precedence" when distributing tzedakah includes the poor of Jerusalem, because we are all citizens of Jerusalem. (Talmud, Bava Metzia)

Fourth. our wilderness is not simply a desert. It is The Wilderness of Sinai. And in this we find the answer to our questions. The Hebrew word bamidbar (in the desert) has a numerical value of 248. This is also the number of positive mitzvot which our Torah has given us. By incorporating the values of Sinai into our lives, we will daily place Jerusalem in the very centre of our personal world. We will achieve Yerushalayim; we "will see perfection."

The Hebrew phrase b'zelem Elokim (created in the image of G-d) also has a value of 248. (Rabbi Yitzchak Ginsburgh) From this we learn that we can achieve our life's purpose, namely our spiritual perfection when we perform positive acts with devotion. Then we can return to the purity of our being in and feeling Jerusalem. Where is Jerusalem found? It is wherever you allow her to enter.

Senior repels mugger with handy onion

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Izzie Rotterman has done a nifty take on the old Yiddish curse, "May you grow like an onion — with your head in the ground."

Recently in Florida, Rotterman used a meaty, half-kilo Vidalia onion to practically put a mugger's head into the ground.

It happened in Pompano Beach, where Rotterman, a hale 81-year-old Toronto financial adviser and lover of the sweet Vidalia, was about to have dinner at a swank Italian restaurant with his business partner.

As always when he eats out, Izzie was carrying his favorite veggie, wrapped in a plastic bag, to chop into his salad. Suddenly, a man appeared from the shadows of the parking lot and made a grab for the partner's purse.

Instinctively, Rotterman swung the onion at the mugger. "I gave him two good k'nucks, one to the chin and another to his head," he says. Stunned, the attacker fled with an accomplice.

The restaurant's manager called the police and the rest is show-biz history. "And I ate the evidence," Izzie adds, with a twinkle in his eye.

His derring-do earned front-page coverage in Florida newspapers, which are normally filled with glum tales of muggings of seniors and tourists. From there, the story was picked up by CNN, the CBC and other media outlets. Calls still come from radio stations in Europe.

The clincher came a few weeks ago, when Rotterman discussed the incident with Jay Leno on the Tonight Show.

Interspersed with all the media hoopla was an all-expenses paid trip to Vidalia, Ga., where Rotterman was guest of honor at the state's annual 10-day onion festival.

They take their Vidalias seriously in Dixie. It's Georgia's official vegetable and brings in some $50 million in yearly revenue.

The governor even made Rotterman an honorary commissioner of agriculture, while the mayor of Vidalia awarded him the key to the city. "I guess I put the town on the map," Izzie chuckles.

But thinking back, he's less lighthearted about the actions that won him his 15 minutes of fame.

"In retrospect, it was more stupid than brave. What if [the mugger] had a gun or a knife? I wasn't thinking ..."

As for Rotterman's weapon of choice, "I've been eating 'em for years. A salad isn't a salad without a Vidalia. They're nice and sweet."

While denying he's a hero, Rotterman allows that the incident "is good for onions, good for Canadians and good for the Yiddin."

Shul increases choice of caterers

Bold move for Beth Tikvah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beth Tikvah Synagogue, in a bold move, has switched from having a single caterer to offering a choice of four.

Catering chair Bev Holtzman told The CJN that members of the congregation, as well as the public, are excited to be able to decide between GMB Culinary Productions, in association with Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers; Levy's Catering; Malmar Fine Foods and Catering; and Peter Graben Fine Foods. All are glatt kosher and under the supervision of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of Toronto (COR).

"A lot of people were requesting choices in such things as style and price. We were concerned about people going elsewhere to get those choices — we wanted to keep Jewish life cycle events here in the synagogue," she said.

While some Reform temples also offer different caterers, Beth Tikvah, Holtzman said, is the only Conservative synagogue to do so.

"There is a lot of risk and change in routine," she said. "There is a lot more responsibility put on the shul catering committee, but I think there will be more satisfaction in the end."

Response so far has been enthusiastic, Holtzman said. "It's rewarding to see the enthusiasm, when people can pick someone who suits them in style, price and personality."

The four caterers were not just picked out of a hat. "We did a lot of research," Holtzman said. The catering committee, which represented a cross-section of the congregation, she noted, sought applications, eliminated a few who were either not very experienced or were not under COR, and chose nine to test.

"Each potential caterer had an evening where they provided a 'middle of the road' type meal and was rated on, for instance, quality of food, staffing and presentation."

The synagogue is having a Simcha Fair, on May 22, from 7 to 10 p.m., to introduce the open kitchen concept and the caterers to the congregation and to the community.

Guests will be able to sample a few of each caterer's offerings, meet the caterers and view the synagogue.

"We have a number of rooms for affairs, a sanctuary and a beautiful chapel which can hold up to 500. As well, we have just commissioned two new chupahs, which will be on view."

There will also be 25 to 30 simchah-related services, Holtzman said, such as music, invitations, flowers, gift registries and makeup.

"There will even be some door prizes," she said.

Gains of women in Judaism explored

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — These days, Jewish parents often have to provide explanations if they don't have a special ceremony to welcome a newborn daughter.

An American sociology professor, speaking at the Lipa Green building recently, said she still cries when she attends a Simchat Bat. "It makes me feel like in a very short time we accomplished something," said Rela Mintz Geffen, coordinator of the program in Jewish Communal Service at Philadelphia's Gratz College.

Rela Mintz Geffen

Geffen was keynote speaker at an evening entitled In Search of our Spiritual Growth: What's Changing for Jewish Women? The event was co-sponsored by UJA Women's Campaign and the Jewish Women's Federation social and political action committee. Catherine Bianco, president of Holy Blossom sisterhood; Shayna Kravetz, lawyer and founding member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's Rosh Chodesh group; Lori Palatnik, rebbitzen and author; and Ontario cabinet minister Elaine Todres, who celebrated her bat mitzvah at age 40, also spoke.

Having a daughter is often a radicalizing experience for a Jewish woman, Geffen said. "Women who didn't want anything for themselves [in the area of Jewish ritual], wanted for their daughters."

Saying Kaddish is another common radicalizing experience, Geffen noted. If someone says there are only nine people for a minyan, when a woman who's present would bring the total to 10, "suddenly you're not even a person," she said.

Jewish women are exempt from time-bound mitzvot such as praying at certain times every day. Traditional explanations include variations on the woman-is-more-spiritual theme (meaning that they don't need those prayers to elevate them), but Geffen sees it differently.

"If you look at the texts, you will see that that's not what it says. Who are the righteous women? Akiva's wife who worked and slaved for years and sold her hair so that Akiva could continue his studies. Women who chopped holes in the ice so there could be a mikvah ... In the past women fulfilled their obligations by enabling men to participate in certain mitzvot rather than doing them themselves. Their holiness and spirituality was real but it was derivative in nature."

In recent years the Jewish women's movement has had an impact in the areas of Talmud and Torah study, life cycle rituals, prayer and public domain of the synagogue, Geffen said.

Until the late 1800s Jewish women rarely received any formal Jewish education, she noted. If one accepts the words of the Jewish sage Hillel, who said, "An ignoramus cannot be pious," [most] Jewish women could not be truly pious, Geffen added.

"I would say the opening up of study of classical Jewish text to Jewish women was absolutely critical. The last 10 to 15 years have seen tremendous movement in this area in modern Orthodox circles."

Toronto teen wins math contest

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Maybe Grade 9 student Matthew Buchalter gets his mathematical ability from his father Sheldon, an accountant, but Buchalter Sr. says no.

Matthew, who turns 14 this month, recently won a gold medal in the University of Waterloo's annual Canadian Mathematics Championships, placing among the top five students out of some 35,000 across Canada.

His school, Thornlea Secondary School, placed 10th among Canadian schools, based on the marks of the three students who scored highest in the contest.

After Matthew wrote the exam at his school and compared answers with friends, he was convinced he was wrong on at least three of the 25 questions.

His final mark was 142 out of 150, one of the highest marks possible because some questions were worth four or eight marks, and a wrong answer counted for zero.

"I wasn't as smart as him in Math when I was his age," says Sheldon.

Matthew Buchalter

"When we go into a fast food place, if there are 15 different combinations of ways you can order specials, it's beyond me to figure out which is the best combination to buy. Matthew will tell you in about 20 seconds."

Matthew, who likes playing baseball and watching sports on television, is in the gifted program at Thornlea Secondary School, where his favorite subject is — what else? — math.

"It comes easy to me. There's a right answer or a wrong answer. No opinion. No explaining."

UJA March fancy foot work for oldest participant

If 82 year old Hannah Rensler has her way, she'll be one of the first to cross the finish line at this year's UJA Community March for Israel, May 26. "Once she gets going she's hard to keep up with," explains nephew Howard Rensler, who alerted Community Matters to his aunt's history of raising thousands of dollars for local charities and Jews around the world.

Hannah Rensler is the oldest Community March for Israel participant. For the last 7 years, she has raised more than $1000 for the March - a figure that will likely climb to $2000 this year. "I've always felt a great deal for Israel and I feel we should all do whatever we can to support the country," she stresses. Funds raised by the March will assist young immigrants recently arrived in Israel.

Equipped with a "sensible pair of shoes," Hannah, according to her nephew, is "completely focused and keeps her stride when even her great niece has a hard time keeping up."

Aside from visiting her brother 3 times a week at a Toronto nursing home, Hannah goes to synagogue every Saturday and helps in many ways to raise money for Israel. "She's remarkably healthy," Howard observes admiringly. However, Hannah herself, doesn't understand what the fuss is all about. "I'm a very low key person," she insists.

After it's all over, Hannah says she'll "probably just keep walking down Bathurst until I get home."

Hannah Rensler says she "didn't mind doing the March when it was 16 km. long."

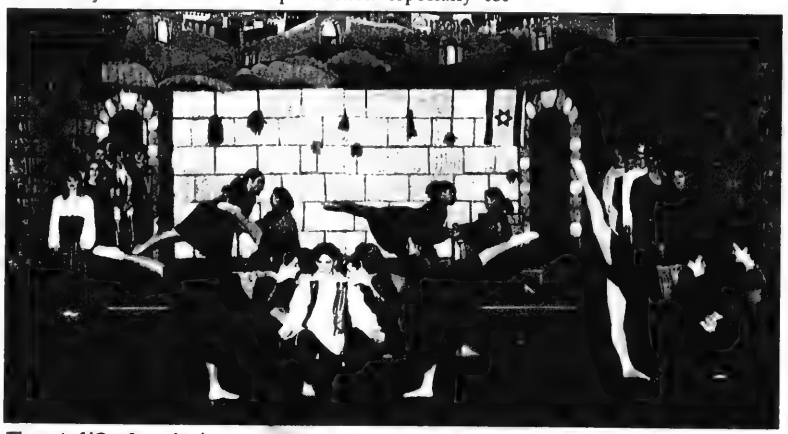
A capital performance

Jerusalem 3000 Festival revelers will get a crash course in Jewish history when the cast from Our Jerusalem takes centre stage at North York Centennial Arena. The highly successful musical will be one of many attractions at the Festival, following the UJA Community March for Israel.

The Festival is co-sponsored by UJA Federation and Canadian Zionist Federation.

The play depicts 3000 years of Jerusalem's history beginning with the binding of Isaac on Mount Moriah in 1700 BCE. Rivka Atzmony and Doron Ophir created the production especially for Jerusalem 3000 celebrations.

Producer Tammy Savion, who says most of the 35 student cast members will be available for the Festival performance on Sunday, May 26, thinks Our Jerusalem is "a great way to bring Israel to the Festival."



The cast of 'Our Jerusalem' recreates 3000 years of history at Leah Posluns Theatre.

City supports Festival

North York, the city with a heart, has proven true to its slogan by financially backing this year's Jerusalem 3000 Festival, May 26, following the UJA Community March for Israel.

The city's Parks and Recreation Committee awarded a $2500 grant to Canadian Zionist Federation, which is co-sponsoring the Festival with UJA Federation. The grant was given to CZF, according to Cultural Affairs Officer Cathi Forbes, "to showcase the multicultural aspects of Toronto's community and to provide the opportunity to learn about each other's culture."

The Festival will take place from 11 a.m.- 4 p.m. at Centennial Arena on Finch, west of Bathurst, the finish line for this year's Community March.

The day's program features live entertainment for all ages, including Israeli music, a barbecue and food for every taste, an auction, theatrical performances and children's activities.

"The whole idea," explains CZF Festival Coordinator, Tillie Margolis, "is to draw the community together in a spirit of fellowship and goodwill."

Canada Trust collections convenience

Canada Trust, the sponsor of this year's UJA Community March for Israel, is accepting March collections at all its branches.

Those with contributions can deposit them under account number 640-503953 at Canada Trust, where they will receive a receipt for proof of deposited donations. For every $50 collected, the marcher's name will be entered into a draw to win a trip for two to Israel.

Sherry Weiss, Manager of Branch Banking at Canada Trust, sees the convenience of donation deposits, and her company's association with UJA Federation as a "great way for Canada Trust to support the community."

UJA Solidarity Mission

From bus to bomb shelter

Solidarity has become more than a slogan for a group of UJA Federation leaders who recently returned from a mission to Moscow, St. Petersburg and Israel.

The nine day journey began peacefully enough with visits to several UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency projects in the former Soviet Union, and ended with a tense two hour stay in a Kiryat Shmona bomb shelter. The group had been touring the deserted northern Israel town on the Lebanese border when a katyusha rocket landed metres from their bus. Participant Lonny Gropper said that although the experience was scary, "none of us wanted to leave."

UJA Federation Campaign Chairman David Goldstein described the group's risky experience as "a true show of support far beyond the reach of financial assistance and good wishes."

While in danger from Hezbullah attacks, Lorri Kushnir quickly realized "we could all be sharing a common fate. We thought we would be observers and all of a sudden we began to run for our lives for shelter." Kushnir was especially overwhelmed by Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations in Jerusalem. "I had no idea how much pride I was going to feel. The display of bravery and strength was tremendously compelling."

Vicki Campbell, who chairs UJA Federation's Women's Campaign, described her experience visiting Soviet Jews as "humbling and very moving."

"This mission more than any other," observed UJA Federation Campaign Director Ted Sokolsky, "reinforced the responsibility Jews have to each other around the world, and how a simple twist of fate placed us where we are today."

"It was a real eye opener," noted Baruch Gur, the Jewish Agency's emissary to Toronto and the architect of Operation Exodus. "Participants had the opportunity to see how much good work is being done by the Agency especially in youth operations."

Mission participants visit Katzrin where these boys continue their studies in a temporary school after being evacuated from the war zone.

Metulla Mayor, Yossi Goldberg, gives Mission participants a description of the damage done to the Canada Centre by Katyusha rockets.

Off to Helsinki. A family of Russian olim prepare for their bus ride to the Finnish capital on their way to Israel. Mission participants were there to bid them farewell.

Mission participant Bonnie Goldstein talks to the leader of the Finnish Chrisitian organization which charters the Helsinki-bound buses.

Mary Golfman pins a Canadian flag on the lapel of Moti Paz, head of the Jewish Agency in St. Petersburg and Helsinki.

Noa (Achinoam Nini) plays at Convocation Hall on Wednesday, May 26

Noa night is on the way

The biblical Noah may have weathered 40 days and 40 nights of torrential rain, but Noa, the Israeli singing sensation, is causing a flood of her own - a flood of international popularity.

Achinoam Nini, better known as Noa, is coming to Convocation Hall on May 22 at 8:30 p.m. to perform her own original recipe of pop, jazz and Middle Eastern sounds. Proceeds from the concert will be donated to UJA Federation, among other organizations.

The 26 year old Israeli-born, Bronx-raised artist and her accompanying guitarist Gil Dor will be performing songs from Noa's latest English album, Calling, which was released in Canada, May 15. In Israel, Noa's chart-topping 1993 hit Bo-ee Kalah (Come to Me Bride) has become a musical anthem at Israeli weddings.

Aside from music, Noa's passion is peace. She appeared on stage with the late Prime Minister Yithzak Rabin at the Tel Aviv rally preceding his assassination. "Peace finds its way into my music," she says. "I believe in the peace process. It is the only option for our survival." Her latest album includes songs commemorating Rabin and victims of terrorism.

Noa concert tickets ($54, $36 and $18) are available by calling Ticketking, (416) 872-1212 or in person at Matana Judaica (248 Steeles Ave. W.) and Edward's Record World (2359 Yonge St.).

The performance is being sponsored by UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet and Jewish Campus Services, the UJA-Federation supported March of the Living, the Consulate General of Israel, the Israeli Association of Toronto and the New Israel Fund. Concert proceeds will go to the sponsoring organizations.

Festival features song finalists

Attetion talent scouts! Mark May 26 on your calendars. That's when the Halleluya 1996 finals are taking place at the Jerusalem 3000 Festival, following the UJA Federation Community March for Israel. The Festival, at North York Centennial Arena, is co-sponsored by Canadian Zionist Federation and UJA Federation.

The winners of the city-wide song writing and performing contest, partially funded by a UJA Federation Jewish Continutity grant, will be awarded a trip to Israel to represent Toronto in the 3rd annual international Halleluya 1996 competition in Jerusalem.

Six 15-22 year old finalists will be selected on May 21 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. All six contestants will then perform at the Festival.

"We're really pleased to see a growing interest from local talent," says Efraim Sapir, Co-chair of Halleluya 1996. "We hope the success of this year's competition will entice others to come forward next year."

Play to support Yiddish

UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish is banking on the success of an off-broadway hit to raise funds for Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto. On Sunday, May 26, 7:30 p.m., a special gala performance of Avi Hoffman's Too Jewish, will be held at Leah Posluns Theatre to help raise $50,000 for the Yiddish Studies Program.

For the last three years, under the leadership of Bayla Chaikof, the Committee for Yiddish Studies at U of T, has been helping to keep the program alive.

"We're hoping to fill the theatre this year," says Chaikof, who, with her colleagues, has raised more than $200,000 in endowments administered by UJA Federation. Four Yiddish courses, from introductory to advanced classes, are currently being offered at U of T.

Tickets for the gala are $50 each and available by calling (416) 635-2883 ext. 600.

Jewish Agency opens windows

He's not exactly Bill Gates, but Yosef Dinerstein, 29, a new immigrant from St. Petersburg, Russia, is working for Microsoft in Israel, where he is helping to develop a new generation of Windows products.

Dinerstein, who immigrated to Israel with his parents in 1989, with the assistance of the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency, never imagined that he would someday be employed by Microsoft. He had been a computer student at Leningrad University before his arrival in Israel, and enrolled at Tel Aviv University after he made aliyah. His tuition was paid for by the Agency's Student Authority. The result is a budding career with one of the world's outstanding software companies.

After graduating from Tel Aviv University, Dinerstein began work in 1993 as a computer engineer for Israel Aircraft Industries. Soon after, he answered a Microsoft newspaper ad but expected to be rejected. Dinerstein was wrong. He not only prevailed over dozens of other candidates, he is one of three new immigrant computer software specialists among Microsoft Israel's team of 30.

Dinerstein, who is married with a three year old daughter, comes from a refusenik family. "My parents waited 10 years for their exit visas," he says. "I grew up with a very strong sense of Jewish identity. We were not orthodox but we went to synagogue for some of the festivals."

"And of course there was always anti-Semitism in the air," he adds, "in case a Jew was to forget that he was Jewish."

In his office, Dinerstein sits surrounded by three computers used for developing and testing systems. Clearly enjoying his work, Dinerstein explains that he is developing software "so interesting to use that people want to explore their computer's capabilities."

The UJA Federation-supported Jewish Agency helped Yosef Dinerstein get his dream job.

Summer clothing campaign is no sweat

Jewish Women's Federation is asking day school students to help clothe the needy.

The children's clothing drive is the first program for JWF's Community Response Project, to help agencies maintain services in the wake of government cutbacks.

Students are being asked to bring one or two pieces of good quality summer clothing – either new or barely used – to their schools, between May 27 and May 29. The clothes will be delivered by volunteers to Just a Second, the Jewish Family and Child Service clothing store, as it nears its busiest season. Participating schools are Associated, Bialik, CHAT, Eitz Chaim, Leo Baeck, Netivot Hatorah, Or Chaim, Or Haemet, She'arim, Ulpanat Orot and USDS.

"It's a pilot program that we hope will continue on an ongoing basis," explains Danita Dubinsky, who co-chairs the Community Response Project with Ellen Kachuck. "We're trying to help meet needs by matching our more than 50 Jewish Women's Federation affiliates with community agencies and organizations.

According to Dubinsky, approximately 3500 Jewish children – many of whom rely on donated clothing – live below the poverty line.

"So far the response has been very positive," says clothing drive chair, Barbara Barak. "It's an easy way for members of the community to show they care about our children."

Federation nominations

TORONTO — The nominees for Board of Directors, Board of Governors and individual representatives to Council have been anounced by Bernard Ghert, nominations committee chair for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Elections will be held during the federation's 21st annual meeting scheduled for June 4, 7:30 p.m., at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

In accordance with the bylaws, the governance consists of a council, the president, a Board of Governors and a Board of Directors. An executive committee will be elected by the Board of Directors from amongst the directors. No nomination can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following bylaws.

"Only members of the federation who have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal in respect of the previous year, and are in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal, shall be eligible to serve as an individual or group representative on the council.

"Any 20 representatives may nominate any individual member of the federation for election to the Board of Directors and the position of president, provided that: a) any one individual representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Board of Directors; b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council.

"Any seven individuals or group representatives may nominate any individual or group representative of the federation for election to the Board of Governors, provided that: a) any one representative may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the Board of Governors; b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of Council.

"Any seven members may nominate any individual member of the federation for election to the council provided that: a) any one member may nominate not more than three nominees for election to the council; b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and c) such nominations shall be delivered to the federation at least 21 days before the annual meeting of members."

Re-nominated for president is Sandra Brown. CJC holds 'productive' meeting with Rock

OTTAWA — Justice Minister and Attorney General of Canada Allan Rock met recently with a delegation led by Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) past two national presidents, Les Scheininger and Prof. Irving Abella.

"It was a very productive meeting," said Abella, chair of CJC's war crimes committee. "This minister understands the urgency of the Nazi war crimes cases and appreciates the harm done to minorities in Canada by the spread of hate propaganda. He is prepared to take action on both matters."

CJC raised concerns about the delays in the judicial system which have bogged down the war crimes and denaturalization proceedings currently in the Federal Court of Canada and may slow the pace of forthcoming cases.

Rock assured CJC that new cases would be brought forward in the very near future and noted that his department was considering its options to resolve the legal issue at the heart of the logjam of current proceedings.

"It is gratifying that the minister shares our frustration over the undue delays in the Federal Court which have further slowed the process in dealing with individual cases to denaturalize and deport Nazi war criminals," said Scheininger, chair of CJC's international affairs committee.

Also discussed was the current disposition of possible amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada to assist in reviving the option of laying criminal charges against suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada.

CJC reiterated its long-standing position that the current anti-hate provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada should not be amended, particularly in the wake of the recent decision on James Keegstra, in which the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously upheld the constitutionality of the law.

Other issues discussed included hate in cyberspace, national unity, anti-terrorism measures and amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Also in the delegation were CJC's national executive director and general counsel Jack Silverstone, Ottawa advocacy office director Eric Vernon and associate national director of community relations Steven Shulman.

Cantors receive enthusiastic welcome

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — When cantors Stuart Friedman, Yaakov Motzen and Moshe Weiss hit the final note of Shehechianu to close their performance, the audience at Halifax's Beth Israel Synagogue rose as one to afford the three men a standing ovation.

And very well deserved!

For the cantors entertained and enthralled more than 250 people, Jewish and non-Jewish, through two hours of cantorial, operatic, Israeli and Yiddish music. Several audience members yelled, "Encore," and the three men bounced through a version of Sim Shalom that brought another standing ovation.

This was the Three Cantors Concert II, presented by the Jewish Men's Club of Halifax and the Atlantic Jewish Council, with proceeds to the Jewish Family Services Committee of Halifax. Last year's inaugural concert, featuring Friedman and Montreal-area cantors Arie and Yair Subar, raised $3,500. Concert coordinator Leo Weniger expected close to the same amount this year.

Friedman, cantor at Beth Israel Synagogue, sang four selections, including E Lucevan le stelle, an aria from Puccini's Tosca, and Amar Rabbi Elazar, from Shabbat services.

Weiss, cantor of the Jewish Centre of Atlantic Beach on Long Island, opened the concert with A Dudlele, a Yiddish folk song, his smooth tenor voice giving the audience a taste of what was to come. He later held the audience with Lo Teida Milchama (You Shall Know No More War).

"I started singing in a choir when I was seven or eight," he said in a post-concert interview." "It's been in my blood ever since. My mother's father was a cantor in Europe who died in the Holocaust. I was named after him and his spirit resides in me."

Weiss has been a guest chazzan in synagogues throughout the United States.

Motzen, born in Tel Aviv, is a fifth generation chazzan, who was a choir soloist when he was 6 years old. After holding major positions in Israel, he came to Montreal in 1978 and is currently at Adath Israel Synagogue.

He has performed around the world, including at a recent concert as a soloist with the Johannesburg Jewish Male Choir. He has sung in Hungary, Romania, Russia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Australia and England.

His deep, booming tenor voice raised goose-bumps with a rendition of Lefichach (It is Upon Us to Praise) from the daily morning service. And he showed a certain softness with Hechalil (The Flute), an Israeli folk song.

"This was an outstanding success," said Weniger. "Judging from the exuberance of the audience and people to whom I spoke afterwards, it was a fabulous night.

THE PROMISE: 50 years ago a vow was made by those who had survived the Holocaust to those who had perished, that from Generation To Generation we will never forget!

THE PROBLEM: Revisionists and those who deny the Holocaust took place are more vocal than ever. Unfortunately, living witnesses of the Holocaust who can challenge these revisionists will soon disappear. The continual education of future generations must be ensured.

THE SOLUTION: The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has established The Dan Family Multi-Media Centre. Through interactive computer discs it will teach generations to come the history of the Holocaust. It will fortify our children against the new anti-semitism. And it will represent a permanent record of the Holocaust.

THE QUESTION: Will you become a member of Yad Vashem to help support and finance The Canadian Pavilion for Holocaust Studies, which includes a Multi-Media Centre? It is the best way to educate the world as to what happened over 50 years ago this year.

THE DETAILS: Your membership will be from January to December. A Full Tax Receipt will be mailed to you for 1996.

If you wish further information on any of the above programs, please contact our Executive Director, Marilyn Somers at 905-660-6028.

Exhibit creates 'gates' into Jerusalem's past

By MAGDA PHILIPS
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA – "Jerusalem is a city which transcends its own frontiers," says curator Cheryl Jaffee, standing in the middle of the exhibition of rare Hebraic and Judaic books currently on display at the National Library of Canada, 395 Wellington St., Ottawa.

"I have tried to create gates of entry into the very long and dense history of Jerusalem."

The exhibition opens four main gates of entry to Jerusalem – the sacred, the historical, the literary and the artistic. Each of the 30 rare books exhibited – from sacred scriptures to histories, from religious poetry to travel accounts – offers access to one or more of these gates.

Jaffee's accompanying texts provide carefully prepared and interesting explanations of the books and their connection to Jerusalem.

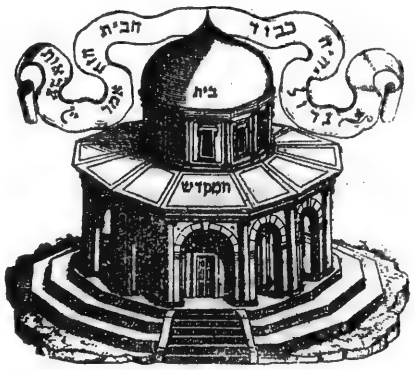
The Hebrew Bible printed in Paris around 1540 is open at II Samuel Chps. 5-6.

This passage tells the story of Jerusalem's beginnings – of David being anointed king and moving his capital to Jerusalem.

The Temple is depicted in one of the historical books on display, a 1732 edition of the works of Flavius Josephus. His detailed and often controversial histories are the only eye-witness accounts of how the Jews became an exiled people.

"But Jerusalem continued to live with the people, in the study of texts, in prayer," says Jaffee. "Jerusalem had become moveable."

The moveable Jerusalem is represented in the exhibition by Haggadah texts and Mishna commentaries, by bibles and prayer books, by teachings and treatises. It is also represented by literary works like a children's picture book of Jewish holidays, and collections of religious poems mourning and lamenting the lost Temple.



The Temple is, in fact, a major symbol for intellectual and spiritual life.

Printers often used it as their printer's mark, depicting the candelabrum, the Temple itself or hands spread in priestly blessing.

The implements and tools of the Temple serve as symbols of a restored Jerusalem. On display are illustrations to one of the Haggadah texts, created by contemporary scribe-illuminator David Moss. He depicts the set Passover table, laid with implements of the Temple instead of regular knives and forks.

But Jerusalem captured more than religious imagination. A genre of Holy Land travel writing became popular in the 15th century, and the exhibition shows a map from the 1977 reprint of the first book of this genre – Bernard von Breydenbach's 1486 Die Reise ins Heilige Land. Also on display is a 1912 polyglot dictionary and phrase book intended for pilgrims and travellers to the Holy City.

The pilgrims include Jews, Christians and Muslims, a fact which ties into another important aspect of the exhibition.

"I tried to tie in the connections of the other two monotheistic religions to Jerusalem," says Jaffee. "Jerusalem has touched all of us, and that's part of what this exhibition is all about."

The exhibition is sponsored by the Canada Israel Cultural Foundation, the Embassy of Israel and the National Library of Canada.

Jerusalem 3000, a companion mini-exhibit of posters, supplied by the Embassy of Israel to celebrate the city's 3,000th anniversary, depicts the holy places, architecture and culture of contemporary Jerusalem.

The exhibit is open daily, 9 a.m. to 10:30 p.m, until May 31. No admission charge.

The Jacob M. Lowy Collection of Rare Hebraica and Judaica

The 30 books in the exhibition cannot be touched or handled. But just one floor up, the Jacob M. Lowy Collection of rare Hebraica and Judaica, where the books in the exhibition come from, is open to the public.

Acquired by a gift to the Crown in 1977, this impressive collection has grown to almost 3,000 volumes representing over five centuries of printing. It is the largest holding of Hebraic and Judaic printed material in a Canadian public institution.

Many people come to visit the collection, from students and scholars, to artists and ordinary people who walk in off the street. Jaffee is happy to receive people singly or in groups. She loves to see people in contact with the books.

"I have seen a few people become very moved because of the antiquity of the book," she says. "It's a very physical contact you make."

Because it's a rare book room, it's normally locked. So it's best to call in advance and make sure that Jaffee is there.

To arrange to visit the collection, call 613-995-7960.

To help the collection grow and develop in terms of acquisitions, research and scholarly projects, a Council of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection is being formed under the aegis of the Friends of the National Library. For more information call Dan Mozersky 416- 485-7898.

Tax cuts criticized

The audience applauded Clement when he said welfare receipients in Ontario were getting too much money and questioned whether young people, who cannot support themselves, should get welfare if they leave home.

Harold Segal, a Betel executive and former pharmacist, said new government charges for seniors under the drug plan will result in he and his wife paying $1,000 more in a year, despite the cut in income tax.

Despite many questions from the floor, and comments of economist panelist Armine Yalnitziane, Clement maintained that the tax cuts will stimulate the economy and produce jobs.

Kwinter said the government was in hot water because it tried to make income tax cuts and expenditure cuts in the same year.

UIA launches campaign to line up bequests

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — In the next 20 years, almost a trillion dollars will be transferred in Canada from one Jewish generation to another. The Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal (UIA) hopes some of that amount will go to Israel through bequests.

Shlomo Pollack, a former Montrealer now based in Jerusalem, is the director of the wills and bequest department of UIA. He was here recently with Barney Harris, UIA fundraising director for Canada, to launch a campaign to line up bequests. They started the campaign in Victoria and then went on to Edmonton, Calgary, Toronto, Windsor, London, Ont., and several other Ontario communities.

Pollack said his goal is to convince specially selected prospects to will at least 10 percent of the residue of their estates to Israel. That 10 percent, he contended, will not affect the living standards of the children.

He said the present generation "brought us to our current stage of Jewish life in Israel and in Canada, and hopefully this can continue with the next generation."

However, there could be waning support for Jewish causes in future generations. In the United States, many Jews are giving more to non-Jewish than to Jewish causes. Future funding for Israel and the local community will have to come mainly from bequests, he said.

He added that in 1993, 55,000 Jews in the United States who died, left less than $5,000 to charity and only 1,000 of them left anything for Israel. He said the reason is that "nobody asked them." His department, which has been operating for some 13 years, attempts to remedy that situation. Substantial sums have already been committed and Israel is beginning to feel the benefits.

Bequests can be earmarked for specific projects or go into the general funds of the Jewish Agency, he said.

The present campaign is modest and "more sophisticated," Pollack said, because it's run strictly on a person-to-person basis. Prospects are mainly people who can bequeath $50,000 or more.

His department doesn't publicize bequests, but a memorial book of donors is kept in Jerusalem. Keren Hayesod usually gets a copy of the will in which bequests are made, but this is not a requirement.

Pollack said he encourages donors to consult with their lawyers or financial advisers so that there are no legal misunderstandings.

In effect, he said, "we're asking our prospects to share their capital, as compared to giving from their cash flow to the general campaigns."

Keren Hayesod-UIA raises funds for Israel worldwide, except in the United States, where the United Jewish Appeal does that job. Funds raised in federation and specific UIA campaigns in Canada are transmitted to Israel by UIA of Canada via Keren Hayesod.

FIXTURES AND SEWING MACHINES FOR SALE

Sizzling summer days can play havoc with your skin and makeup, but don't fret, there are many ways to stay looking fresh and cool.

From hot tropical brights to the frostiest pastels, colors seem to dance off the summer palette. Eyes will be the focal point, with lips voluminous and sexy.

An exercise routine is a must. You can't hide that extra five pounds with a T-shirt. Join a health club, do regular stretching and at the very least walk for 20 minutes a day. Keeping fit not only keeps your body healthy, but increases your circulation which will give you a healthy glow.

Many moisturizers and foundations contain sunblock, so check ingredient lists. Sunblock should be worn daily and applied 30 minutes before going outside.

Keep off the pounds with a low-fat and low calorie diet. Vegetable and fruit drinks are not only healthy, but great hunger crunchers.

SKIN CARE

Moisturizers should be lightly textured and applied sparingly. Use a sun block and lip protection daily. Create a healthy summer glow with a "Tan in a bottle."

Estee Lauder: Clear Difference – oil-control hydrator is an oil free fluid gel that will dramatically benefit the look and feel of your skin. It regulates oil production while delivering oil-free moisture to help keep the skin supple and free of clogged pores. This product is perfect for the summer months when your oil glands tend to be more active due to intense humidity.

Biotherm: Self Tanning – Special Wrinkle Sun Care (face) and Hydro-Nutritive Self-Tanning Lotion (body) both contain the pure extract of Thermal Plankton – a pure, active concentrate from thermal springs which stimulates the natural defence and repair potential of the skin. This product promises to give that sun kissed look.

Estee Lauder: Self-Action SuperTan with natural fruit acid predicts that you can have a natural looking tan in one to two hours. The secret appears to be the gentle fruit acid that adjusts the skin's natural pH, making SuperTan more compatible with your skin, so only the most natural "tan tones" develop. Available for face and body.

FOUNDATION

Choose a color that suits your skin tone. Two shades darker is the limit. To prevent a demarcation line, use a small amount of moisturizer along the jaw line and blend well.

Estee Lauder: "Impeccable Quick Finish Makeup" is a light-weight, oil-f creme gel formulation that smoothes on easily and feels weightless. Its compact portablilty is perfect for the lady on the go.

Lancome: Maquicontrole, is a long-wearing foundation that will make your skin look smooth, matte and flawless.

BLUSH

Sweep on the gentlest of color high on your cheekbone and blend well. Dust bronzing powder over your entire face, be sure to use a large soft bursh to avoid streaking.

Chanel: Rose Astral is a fresh, luminous pink blush that will give you that flushed look of summer. For that extra natural look use a soft sponge for blending. Create a rich golden glow, with Chanel's Perfecting Bronze Powder.

EYES

Eyes shimmer with new iridescent pastel shades. New beige tones are fresh and natural. Line your eyes precisely, or simply keep them smudged.

Elizabeth Arden: Eyefix. This charm of a product not only moisturizes your eye area, but keeps your eye makeup fresh all day.

Chanel: Quatre Ombre De Chanel (four shadows) – Satin, Mist, Flint and Glow, presents a complete opalescent color collection for the fashion forward woman. For a more natural look, Chanel's new threesome, Safran, Gold and Taupe is fabulous and not quite as glitzy.

Lancome: Le Crayon Glace is a waterproof high gloss eye color pencil that couldn't be easier to apply. White eye pencil is fun and will give your eyes that extra sparkle.

LIPS:

Lips are shining, full and sensuous. Colors are iced pearlized and luminized. Too add volume, follow your lip line with a color similar to your lipstick.

Elizabeth Arden: Lip-Fix – is the perfect answer to keeping your lips soft and keeping your lipstick on through the day and even dinner.

Estee Lauder: "A Hot Summer of Frozen Colors" – Pastel lipsticks drenched with iridescence, fresh icy colors like: Frozen Rose, Berry Brr and Snow White are gorgeous on their own or will help you update your summer makeup '96.

Clinique: Due to the lack of melanin in your lips, you need extra protection from the sun. Sun Buffer Lipstick SPF 15 will help rescue your lips from burning and chapping. It is waterproof, PABA-free and comes in a variety of natural looking colors. Remember, keep those lips soft and kissable.

FRAGRANCE

Feeling feminine in the summer is especially appropriate. Light, fresh scents are a must!

Estee Lauder: White Linen Breeze, could it be better than the famous White Linen? Try it, it's definitely summer in a bottle.

Carol Birken Wise is a beauty and fashion expert. She will be conducting seminars at the Learning Annex (964-0011) throughout the summer months.

Israel's issues, emotions inspired new album by Noa

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB News editor

TORONTO – With her latest album, Calling, about to be released, Israeli singer Noa will bring her golden voice and exotic rhythms to Convocation Hall May 22.

Calling – her first all-English album – "was inspired by the issues and emotions of Israel," the 26-year-old Yemenite-Israeli said from Amsterdam recently.

"This new album is a lot more powerful [than Noa , her 1993 release], more emotional, more mature, more middle-Eastern (mostly Israeli), and a lot deeper. There's a lot more questions being asked."

Unlike Noa, which was a lighter, more upbeat album, Calling tackles deeper subjects. The song All Is Well, for example, is a reaction to a bus bombing in Tel Aviv that killed 40 soldiers, while Mark of Cain is a political allegory about Israel.

Noa performed at last November's tragic peace rally, finishing her set 15 minutes before Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

Despite her strong feelings about Israel – she made aliyah at the age of 17 and now lives in Tel Aviv– she explained living there doesn't necessarily make the turmoils and polarities of Israel an obvious thing to write about.

"This album is about Israel. It doesn't mean the next one will be. A person can write a song from the middle of the jungle. It all depends on what kind of person you are."

Noa

Although some artists can only express themselves fully through their art, Noa said that's not the case with her. "I'm an open and expressive person anyway. I do it through conversation, dance, music anything. That's why I like to perform on stage."

Strangely enough it was serving in the Israeli army that pushed Noa in her musical direction.

"I wrote songs at an early age [at 11 her music teacher wanted to record some of her songs] but I didn't believe I was going to be a singer and it wasn't until I served in the army for two years as a singer that I felt I wanted to be a singer and proceeded to do just that."

Although her Yemenite parents moved to New York from Israel shortly after her birth, Noa always felt uncomfortable there, and decided to return when she was 17.

"My parents never made a move to integrate [into the U.S. mainstream]," Noa says and because of her Yemenite-dark skin and unpronouncable name (her full name is Achinoam Nini) she always felt like an outsider. A "wildflower growing in all the wrong places," she says in one of her songs off Noa.

"I'm always looking far ahead and at that time I was thinking of life, the future, marriage, etc. and for me, the only place in the world I felt comfortable is Israel.

"I felt Israel fulfilled my identity as a Jew. There was too much [identity] conflict in America and I didn't want to deal with it. Israel is a place I can rest my soul."

It also helped undoubtedly that a year before moving to Israel she met her future husband, Asher Barak, at a summer camp there.

She admits she wasn't aware that she would have to serve for two years in the Israeli army but fortunately she landed in an outfit as a singer entertaining troops.

"Mandatory service is something the European media don't understand. They say 'If you're a pacifist why did you join the army?' They don't understand in Israel you have to because of the situation there. That's why [because of the mandatory service] people in Israel understand the value of peace more than anyone else in the world."

She said although she was a singer in the army it still was no summer camp. "The army is not a fun thing. It demands a lot of you. I was lucky to be a singer but it was still very gruelling. Music and the army do not have anything to do with each other. It's not easy being forced to sing on command."

Noa combines American folk/pop with Middle-Eastern rhythms.

However she acknowledges everything worked out in the end. "I'm happy I was forced to sing or I wouldn't be doing it now."

It was after her stint in the army she attended the Rimon School of Jazz and Contemporary Music where she met Gil Dor a classical guitarist and composer who helped her fine-tune her talent. After recording two albums as a duet, Dor hooked her up with jazz guitarist Pat Metheny, who produced her third album Noa.

Noa's music magically combines American folk/pop (Joni Mitchell/ Paul Simon) with Middle-Eastern/ Oriental melodies and rhythms (Ofra Haza/ Oum Khaltoum). A contemporary Canadian comparison is native singer Susan Aglukark.

Her music is eclectic, running the gamut of many different styles and her high-pitched voice lends a soothing flavor to her melodies. On stage she is known to begin chanting in Hebrew while beating on darbukkah (traditional hand-held Arabic drums).

"It's been said even our most popish song is very sophisticated to most people. Calling is accessible to anyone with an open mind and will certainly demand your attention. I'm very proud of it."

Calling, produced by Rupert Hine, will be available on Geffen Records early in June. Tickets for her Toronto concert are on sale at Edward's Record World (2359 Yonge St.), Matana Judaica (248 Steeles Ave. W.) or by calling 416-872-1212.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

It's A Wrap: Seeing the crowds outside the Bloor Street Cinema last week, a passer-by asked someone in line whether they were giving out free tickets. "Not only that," came the tongue-in-cheek reply, "but they're paying us to attend!"

As the Toronto Jewish Film Festival wrapped up last week for the fourth time in as many years, it was clear that it has become a permanent and highly anticipated fixture in Toronto's arts calendar. Ticket sales were brisk: more than 100 festival passes were sold at $70 each even before the program was announced. Many films were screened to full or nearly full houses.

Somewhat like the Jew who is ever hopeful of finding the Mashiach, a cinema buff seeks the elusive reward of a sublime cinematic experience. One hopes, for instance, to discover a new Black to the Promised Land or Yidl With Her Fiddle or Mina Tannenbaum or Exodus or Schindler's List.

From where this reviewer sat, however, neither Song of the Siren nor Sh'chur – the two lead films this year – possessed that quintessential magic of which enduring cinematic memories are made.

With an apt pun in the title, Song of the Siren (Israel, 1994) tells the story of a "smart and sexy" Tel Aviv ad exec, Talila Katz, who deliberates between two boyfriends as Saddam Hussein's Scud missiles shower down on the city like poisoned arrows from a crazed Cupid. The film is an escapist dream, a cute romantic comedy that unfolds against a backdrop of sealed rooms and gas masks.

But its self-absorbed heroine and pat Hollywood ending seem equally false when so many larger issues scream for attention. Evidently, Katz and director Eytan Fox never learned the lesson Humphrey Bogart taught us in Casablanca when he said the problems of three little people don't amount to a hill of beans in this lousy world.

While Song of the Siren presents an overly-wide, Americanized view of a Jewish family in which the lead characters have stepped right out of a glossy magazine, Sh'chur (Israel, 1994) presents a claustrophically narrow portrait of a Moroccan-Jewish Israeli family caught in the grip of ritualized Jewish black magic: there isn't a sympathetic character in the lot. The film could have been a gripping dramatic story with a moral; instead, it comes across as a dramatized documentary about a lingering form of witchcraft.

Rewards are often greater when expectations are lower. The films that received "second- billing" - including the various films about the Jews of Cuba, Rhodes, India and China - provided the most outstanding moments at this year's festival.

Perlman & Zukerman: Violinists Itzhak Perlman and Pinchas Zukerman are featured in the President's Evening, a special gala performance of Bach, Mozart and Mussorgsky with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), May 21, 7 p.m. Roy Thomson Hall, Toronto.

In a program designed to showcase his talents, Zukerman plays with and conducts the TSO on May 29 and 30. 416-593-4828.

In Brief: Something For Nothing, the adaptation of a Jewish folk-tale that explores a boy's relation with his grandfather, combines music, dance, drama and puppetry. It's based on the book by Phoebe Gilman. May 19 at 4 p.m. and May 20 at 2.30 p.m. at Harbourfront (part of the Milk International Children's Festival that runs May 13 to 20).

Joe Rosenthal sculpture chosen as Rabin Award recipient

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

LOS ANGELES — The Los Angeles based Friends of Sheba Medical Centre (FSMC) has chosen a sculpture by Toronto artist Joe Rosenthal to receive its second Rabin Award.

The Sheba Medical Centre is located in Tel Hashomer near Tel Aviv.

The Rabin Award will be presented annually to those who FMSC deems to have most effectively advanced the cause of peace, exemplifying Yitzhak Rabin's efforts to bring peace to the Middle East.

The first recipient of the award was Leah Rabin who was honored for her courage in speaking out to help maintain her late husband's legacy and for her spirited challenge to the forces who were trying to derail the peace plan in the wake of his assassination.

Rosenthal says that the choice of his 19-inch bronze, originally entitled Endless Journey, which embodies a vigorously articulated individual treading within a sphere, was fortuitous.

"Seven years earlier," he notes, "one of my exhibitions carried a photo of Endless Journey on its mailing piece and was similarly advertised in the Globe and Mail."

Peace quest

The work remained unnoticed by the media he says, but the mailing piece was seen in Los Angeles by an FSMC director who remembered it much later when the search began for a sculpture which would symbolize the spirit of the award.

In response to a phone call from Los Angeles, the artist submitted photographs and Endless Journey, was selected by the FSMC board.

At the awards banquet, posters of the sculpture, renamed Eternal Journey to represent the ongoing human quest for peace, were distributed to the guests. FSMC reports that $2 million was raised that evening. Funds will be partially allocated to a memorial wall at the Sheba Medical Centre, which will incorporate a lifesize scale-up of the sculpture.

Rosenthal is a painter and sculptor who explores the human condition, creating works of strength and tenderness.

Gala Film Screening
A riveting account of modern day descendants of the Jews who were forcibly converted during the Spanish Inquisition, the film features performances by Placido Domingo, Zubin Mehta and the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. Meet co-director Simcha Jacobovici ("Deadly Currents").

Notebook computer biz thriving

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

NORTH YORK — Niche marketing, competitive pricing and good service are only some of the reasons for the continued growth of The Notebook Store, a North York business specializing in notebook computers, accessories and equipment for users of portable computers.

"We're aggressive in terms of selling, which means we sell products that people want at prices very close to cost. Those factors alone add up to success," says owner Corey Meiteen.

Meiteen, 30, who opened the business in 1991 after a career as a computer broker, says that while working in the field, he realized that portable computers were the way to go.

"With a portable computer, business people can carry their office with them," he says. "They can go on site and order, sell and compare prices on the spot. Salespeople have access to instant presentations. Notebooks may cost a bit more than desktops but they can be taken everywhere — they replace two computers.

"Computers are no longer a luxury; they are a commodity item. Business people cannot live without them — they are the life of an industry. I see this year as the year of wireless communication. People will be able to keep in touch with their offices with nothing but a notebook. They really won't need offices anymore. Get a computer and a phone, and you are in business. When purchasing a computer, then, consumers need to know exactly what they're getting."

Staff at The Notebook Store know this, says Meiteen, and someone is always on hand to educate consumers about various manufacturers and about the product that is right for them.

"While most mainstream retailers handle desktop computers and notebooks, generally from only a few manufacturers, we specialize in selling name-brand notebook computers from a wide range of manufacturers. Competing on price is important, but providing customers with the right technology choices from a wide range of available models is an added value that remains rare in the computer industry," he says.

On the heels of a $14-million record-breaking year, a leap from the $200,000 it enjoyed in its first year of business, The Notebook Store has recently completed its third round of expansion.

"Together, the three phases allowed us to grow from 700 square feet to a total of 3,000 square feet. As a result, we've been able to broaden our notebook selection, our range of services and our store personnel. In fact, the extra room has made it comfortable for the 14 people who work here, seven of whom were hired during the past year."

"Before the expansion, we could only service machines that were out of warranty. When everything is complete — we're targeting for the spring — we will be able to service computers under warranty on the premises. What that means is quicker service, less headaches and less paperwork." Meiteen says.

JERUSALEM – Tourism in northern Israel has suffered some NIS12 million (close to $30 million Cdn) in lost business, according to Upper Galilee Tourism Board manager Moshe Attia.

Others in the area noted that although Israelis have been quick to return, it will take more time for foreigners to start coming.

"Before Grapes of Wrath, we had 80 percent occupancy for May, but now it has dropped to 50 per cent and we're not sure if those people will show up," Dubi Benari, manager of the guest house at Kfar Blum said.

"If we can recoup June, it will be a good year," Benari said.

The Income Tax Commission announced that compensation to owners of 558 rooms offering rural lodging would come to about $2 million. The criteria for final compensation to the hoteliers is still being worked out, he said.

Hotels elsewhere in the country also suffered as a result of the tension in the north and the terror attacks in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, according to Hotel Association director Avi Rosental.

He said 1996 had started as a record year, with January and February showing 27 percent more tourist stays. He said he feared that potential tourists who made their plans in March and April would not be coming this summer.

Innovative design wins architectural award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – A Toronto architect recently won an award of excellence from the City of Ottawa Heritage Branch for a commercial project he did there.

Sander Gladstone's winning project was the conversion of a 70-year-old animal feed supply building on Richmond Road into the Senior Citizens Tour and Travel Inc.

Gladstone said he and Danny Shay, who owns the travel agency, wanted "to renovate the building in such a manner as to provide a quality facility both inside and out, from the standpoint of structural integrity, interior design, architectural design, mechanical and electrical capability and neighborhood context."

Recognizing that there were many pedestrians in the neighborhood, they decided to convert a portion of the existing parking lot into a parkette.

The project was cited for its innovative adaptive design and reuse of the building, while fully replacing and upgrading all aspects of the building.

Shay and Gladstone were congratulated at the ceremony for "their vision and commitment to upgrading the urban quality of the Westboro area of Ottawa."

Gladstone told The CJN it was Shay's willingness to be daring and conscious of quality systems and finishes that provided him with an opportunity to find creative solutions for the box-like structure and for his firm, Sander Gladstone Architect, to put forth a winning design.

Gladstone's architectural portfolio includes residences, stores, offices, malls, restaurants, hotels and synagogues.

Gladstone also practises in Israel and has been promoting investments in the development in Israel with Canadian capital.

Bronx bocher's show a real Yankele Doodle Dandy

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who could be sewing up the kishka for the derma festival or hanging the pupiks up to dry?

No one but Avi Hoffman, the 38-year-old writer-performer of Too Jewish?

Though at times he seems to go completely mad singing I'm Dreaming of a White Chanukah, Oy Glaucoma (Oklahoma) and Alta Knacker (Old Man River), his show has a serious side too. It is a rebuttal to those who have made the expression "too Jewish" a put down.

The son of Holocaust survivors, he credits inspiration for the musical to his parents, Mendi and Miriam, and to the Bronx ("we used to sleep seven in one bed") where he grew up and thought everyone in the world spoke Yiddish.

Too Jewish?, a Broadway hit brought to Toronto by co-producers Eda Zimler and Helen Zukerman, will play four performances at the Leah Posluns Theatre, May 26 to 29, with the opening night gala to benefit the Yiddish program at the University of Toronto.

His lush singing of Afn Pripitchik, Afn Veg Shteyt a Boyn, show off his serious side too, as does his closing number, Yiddish lyrics for Faith in Whom a song written for Fiddler on the Roof which Hoffman says never made it on stage because it was considered "too Jewish."

But Hoffman's forte is his ability to give the world's great literature and songs a Yiddish tam. You've never heard a Hamlet soliloquy before that ended, Ich Hub Nisht Kin Koach (I haven't got the strength). One of his favorite targets is Cameron Hamentosh (a well-known British composer?), and the song, Vain nisht for Mir Argentina.

He takes the audience on a singalong of favorite Yiddish melodies in which he manages to inject Yankele Doodle Dandy, Mama of La Mancha (So eat, you're breaking my heart) and A Za Yur of Columbus. The Oomglick Blues is another great number.

He puts on a scrunched-up little cap to impersonate Menashe Skulnick and sing It Shouldn't Happen to a Dog, What Happened to Me, recounting several verses of the little comedian's disasters. "I haven't talked to my wife in three years," he says, "I didn't want to interrupt."

Avi Hoffman seems to go completely mad.

Yiddish diva to perform with Bulgar Klezmer Band

TORONTO – The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band with special guest Yiddish diva Adrienne Cooper will be performing at the Music Gallery Tuesday May 21 at 8 p.m.

The concert will be recorded and released as the group's third album.

Cooper, from New York City, is considered this generation's major interpreter of Yiddish vocal styles. Her performance ranges from the contemporary caberet song to the purity of Chassidic nign with breathtaking musical and emotional range.

Also appearing will be violinist Steven Greenman from Cleveland and Toronto's own percussionist extraordinaire Rick "Shadrach" Lazar, and many others.

Tickets are $10. Call Music Gallery Box Office at 416-204-1080.

Resale art gallery opens

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Private gallery owners are becoming an endangered species, undermined by devastating cuts affecting the art scene. But in true entrepreneurial style, Penny-Lynn Grosman is taking up the challenge, even as galleries close or relocate to more modest space.

Grosman, an art historian and former head of Extension Services at the Art Gallery of Ontario, has opened Pentimento Fine Arts Resale Gallery in an attractive erstwhile coach house set back from the street at 190 Dupont St., two blocks west of Avenue Road.

"This is a new concept," Grosman says. "Today's economic uncertainty has impacted on companies and homeowners who are downsizing and often need to dispose of artwork."

She explains that traditionally one of the few ways to resell art has been at auction, but auction houses rely on the "quick sale" and "bought in," or unsold works are returned. As well, in the present slow market, dealers are less willing to take back art which they sold years earlier because they are striving to move current inventory.

What does the seller do?

Here is where Grosman comes in. Pentimento is a gallery with a difference. When the seller brings in the art, it is accepted on consignment for 90 to 120 days.

In addition, the name Pentimento derives from two sources — the image underlying a work which has been painted over, whose marks sometimes show through, and the Latin verb, pentir, to change. At Pentimento, the resale pieces reappear and the buyers find items that are new and fresh to them.

There is a wide selection of international and Canadian, contemporary and traditional works in various media. All, Grosman affirms, are pieces of merit.

Harold Town's colored serigraphs contrast with an 1864 oil portrait of a young woman in a lace trimmed russet gown, by Hamilton's Richard Pauling.

Three historically important Wiliam Ronald works on paper include an early abstract in duco, casein, oil and watercolor, plus a watercolor and an acrylic, dating from 1952 to 1963.

Quite different is Magic Nights, a series of four landscapes revealing a rare vision, by Argentinian-born, Miami-based, Sebastian Spreng.

Jean Miller Harding's still life juxtaposes a finely detailed Ming vase with green pears.

Inuit sculptor Abraham Anghik's dual image petrified whalebone with African wonderstone, depicts the many faces of the shaman; and Jack Culiner's lyrical bronzes enhance a contemporary corner.

Grosman has chosen her coach house deliberately, noting, "In this relaxing environment, I want to encourage people to discover the joy of art, at prices they can afford."

In addition to providing a facility for buying and selling art, Pentimento offers appraisals framing, conservation advice, in formed research and suggestion for building a collection within one's budget.

U.S. Arabs oppose 'monopoly' over Jerusalem

By SHAWN COHEN
Washington Jewish Week

WASHINGTON – A new ad hoc group of Arab American organizations and leaders is waging a national education campaign on Jerusalem, arguing that sovereignty over Jerusalem must be shared with the Palestinian Arabs in order to achieve an enduring peace.

The Washington, D.C.-based American Committee on Jerusalem (ACJ) is advocating for what it calls the mainstream Arab American position on Jerusalem.

"We believe strongly that there can be no monopoly on sovereignty over Jerusalem by either party, if there is to be a just and lasting peace," said Raafat Dajani, coordinator of the ACJ and a member of the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee (ADC). ACJ and the ADC operate out of the same office complex, but each is considered an independent body.

The status of Jerusalem is one of the key issues to be addressed in final stage talks between Israelis and Palestinians, which began last week. Israeli officials have stated that the entire city must remain the undivided capital of the sovereign Jewish state. Palestinian negotiators argue that eastern Jerusalem, which has a large Arab population, must serve as the capital of a new Palestinian state.

While these positions appear intractable, ACJ members see room for compromise. According to Khalil Jahsan, a member of ACJ's board of directors, the prevailing opinion among mainstream Arab Americans is that Jerusalem should not be redivided. They envision a united city serving as a capital for both Israel and an emerging state of Palestine.

For administrative purposes, Jahsan said, the city would be split into two boroughs – eastern and western Jerusalem – with independent city councils managed by a joint mayoral council of Israelis and Palestinians. Sovereignty would be shared, he noted.

"There is widespread support for this position in the organized Arab American community," said Jahsan, who is also executive director of the National Association of Arab Americans (NAAA). "This seems to be the least common denominator in terms of Israelis and Palestinians.

"If Israel wants sovereignty over east Jerusalem, Palestinians must have some sovereignty over west Jerusalem," Jahsan said.

Technically, ACJ was established last September as a non-profit organization with an initial budget of $150,000. Now, ACJ is trying to raise matching funds. By producing resource materials, organizing seminars and planning for a possible conference in June, the Arab organization is targetting the American public and U.S. government on Jerusalem-related matters.

The committee claims that in the past, information on the subject has been supplied almost exclusively by the Israeli government and pro-Israel groups in the United States.

"We provide the other side of the argument," said Dajani. "We're saying that Muslims, Christians and Palestinians have an equally valid claim, and in some cases longer historical and religious claims to Jerusalem than Jews."

ACJ is directed by a board of governors including Jahsan, Abdulrahman Alamoudi, executive director of the American Muslim Council, and ADC president Hala Maksoud. The committee's president is Rashid Khalidi, a professor at the University of Chicago.

"The odds are stacked against the Palestinians across the board in this peace process," said Jahsan, whose NAAA has lobbied congress on related issues for years. According to Jahsan, worldwide celebrations this year of Jerusalem 3000, focusing on Jewish heritage in Jerusalem, were designed to preempt negotiations. In addition, the U.S. Congress overwhelmingly passed a bill last year to move the American embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, thus recognizing the city as Israel's capital.

"You can't have your cake and eat it too," Jahsan said of the United States, which is also the main mediator in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

Although ACJ has not taken a formal stand on the NAAA proposal, Dajani said the committee could support such a compromise. However, he deviated from that position when pressed on whether eastern Jerusalem would be part of Israel. "That depends on how you define Jerusalem," Dajani responded. He considers eastern Jerusalem, not as a part of Israel, but as land "occupied" by the Jewish state.

According to Dajani, international law and the United Nations do not recognize eastern Jerusalem as part of Israel, because the Jewish state captured that section in the 1967 Six Day War.

Several prominent members of the Arab American community continue to lobby independently in Washington on issues relating to Jerusalem, including James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, who was not asked to serve on the committee.

Eastern Jerusalem is part of the West Bank and therefore implicated in any future Palestinian state, Zogby said, adding, eastern Jerusalem "must be its capital."

Hussein wants Jerusalem as Palestinian capital

BY DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority called on Israel last Sunday to withdraw from what they termed all occupied Arab territory, and to renounce ideas of expansionism and domination.

King Hussein pledged to support the Palestinians' demand for Jerusalem as the capital of a future state, allaying Palestinian fears that Jordan coveted the city.

The king also urged that the numerous holy sites in Jerusalem be shared by Jews, Christians and Muslims.

"As for the holy shrines, we have always believed they should be in the hands of the faithful," Hussein said at a Cairo news conference with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

"But Jerusalem is Arab and God willing, our Palestinian brothers will be able to regain it as a symbol of peace," he said.

Hussein said last week that the holy places in Jerusalem should be outside any sovereignty.

Contrary to his earlier plan, Prime Minister Shimon Peres will not be visiting Amman before the elections, a top aide said Sunday night.

Since it was known that Peres was eager to visit Hussein before the voting, this fuels speculation that the decision to delay the visit was taken in Amman, not in Jerusalem.

Jordanian public opinion was fiercely opposed to Israel's action in southern Lebanon, especially since the attack on Kana. There were parliamentary motions by the Jordanian opposition to cut ties with Israel, and the Independence Day celebration at the embassy in Amman was boycotted by many Jordanians.

It is uncertain whether Hussein also wanted to avoid a visit by Peres at this time so as not to be accused of seeking to influence the election's outcome.

Peres disclosed Sunday night that in the last few weeks, President Hafez al-Assad has rejected his suggestion of a summit meeting between the two countries, but has agreed in principle to a government-level meeting with Israeli officials. Peres told an audience at a campaign rally that Assad had told American mediators he now agrees "to a meeting on a decision-making level."

In a joint statement after a one-day summit in Cairo, Mubarak, Arafat and King Hussein also said recent violence should not distract people from peace as a strategic objective.

Mubarak called the summit to support the Palestinians in the final status negotiations and to try to speed up Israel's talks with Syria and Lebanon.

The three will meet again in Jordan in the first week of June, after the elections.

Israel says UN must share blame for Kana shelling

By MARILYN HENRY and DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK – The government of Israel continued to lash out at the United Nations last week over the organization's report on last month's Kana shelling, charging that the UN had contributed to the incident by sheltering Hezbollah.

"The UN was sheltering the terrorists, enabling them to shoot the Katyushas and the mortars, then giving them protection because they were in the compound and they knew we could not shoot at the compound," Chief Artillery Officer Brig.-Gen. Dan Harel said here.

"The UN, we know now, let Hezbollah work from the Kana compound itself, before and after the shooting," Harel said. "Some of the terrorists were in the compound with their families, went out of the compound, set up the mortar, working very calmly ... 100 metres from the fence, and the UN did nothing about it. Then, after the shelling, they ran back to the UN compound to take cover."

Prime Minister Shimon Peres said that UN influence in Israel would be undermined as a result of what he termed the organization's "scandalous" and "one-sided" report on the Kana killings.

Speaking to reporters in Acre, Peres said, "You cannot write a report as if there is no Hezbollah and there were no Katyushas. According to this report, it seems like the IDF just decided out of the blue to shoot at a UNIFIL camp. There is nothing farther from the truth than this.

"It is very strange that UNIFIL allowed shots to be fired from 150 metres away from the camp, and that it allowed Hezbollah members and their families to hide within the camp ... This report is one-sided, instigating great anger in Israel. I think as a result, the influence of the UN in Israel will be greatly weakened."

Acting Israeli ambassador to the UN David Peleg said the UN is at fault for failing to prevent more than 30 Hezbollah attacks from areas adjacent to UN camps and for sheltering terrorists.

Hezbollah less than 200 metres from UN base

"From the beginning of the operation until the Kana event, we reported 19 times to the UN cases in which Hezbollah shelled us from a distance of less than 200 metres from UN bases," Peleg said. "Altogether during the operation, there were 34 cases. And the question is, why didn't the UN do anything?"

The report on the Kana incident by UN investigator Maj.-Gen. Frank van Kappen of the Netherlands, contends that the shelling, which killed more than 100 people, was not accidental.

Lebanon's UN ambassador, Samir Moubarak, is seeking to have the Security Council condemn Israel, but this is considered unlikely to occur, since the United States has successfully thwarted previous efforts in this direction.

Peleg expressed the hope that the council would issue a presidential statement that refers only in general terms to the report and does not refer to its conclusions.

The van Kappen report fails to mention the real cause of Kana – that Hezbollah launches attacks from positions near UN bases and UNIFIL does not stop them, Peleg told the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. The UN "doesn't question the evidence about Hezbollah firing from UN bases," Peleg said. "They just say there's nothing they can do."

Van Kappen's report cited one case in which a Fijian member of UNIFIL tried to prevent Hezbollah fighters from firing rockets and was shot in the chest.

Peleg also suggested that the UN rushed to judgment and that Israel was being penalized for cooperating in the early stages of the UN inquiry. Israel provided partial data as it became available, rather than waiting until the IDF inquiry was complete. If Israel had waited, Peleg said, "we would not have the problem we have now.

"Our impression is that the conclusion of the report was decided before the collection of data was completed," he added.

The van Kappen report is dated May 1, before Harel arrived in New York to discuss the shelling with UN officials.

IDF soldiers hurt in Lebanon

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – The Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement is showing that it has no intention of halting attacks on Israeli soldiers and their allies in southern Lebanon.

Clashes between Israeli forces and Hezbollah gunmen erupted over the weekend — some two weeks after a ceasefire was achieved — in the security zone.

On May 12, five Israeli soldiers were wounded, one of them seriously, in two separate Hezbollah attacks in southern Lebanon.

An IDF officer was seriously wounded when an anti-tank rocket fired by Hezbollah hit a patrol in the northeastern sector of the security zone.

In a second incident, four other IDF soldiers were wounded, two moderately and two lightly, by shrapnel from mortar shells fired by members of the Shi'ite Hezbollah movement at an IDF outpost in the area. The IDF responded by shelling Hezbollah positions north of the security zone.

Hamas cell found in Jerusalem

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Security forces have uncovered a Hamas terror cell in east Jerusalem, whose members took advantage of their Israeli identification cards to transport the explosives and suicide bombers used in the recent Jerusalem and Ashkelon attacks.

Cell members hid the three bombers and the explosives they used in homes and mosques in Jerusalem for several days before the bombings.

Until Thursday, the Jerusalem District Court had prevented the publication of news of the arrests, at the request of the police and General Security Service (GSS), on the grounds that it would endanger an important security investigation.

Eleven residents of the Ras Al-Amud neighborhood, all of whom were arrested in mid-March and have since been charged in Lod Military Court, made up the cell.

According to police, the 11 admitted they began to organize into an Izzadim Kassam unit about a year before the attacks. They received "military and theoretical training aimed at turning them into a fighting unit" in Gaza, a police spokesperson said. They knew from the outset that they would be involved in attacks in Israel.

In a statement, the spokesperson said that just before the three suicide bombings, five of the suspects received instructions from Hamas members in Gaza to go to a prearranged spot in an orchard near Ashkelon, where they would find explosives.

They took the explosives to hideouts in Ras Al-Amud and Abu Dis, just outside the Jerusalem city line. Days before the attacks, the suicide bombers and explosives were all brought into Jerusalem, where they remained in Hamas safe houses. The cell members used their Jerusalem identity cards to pass army checkpoints, with the bombers (who were residents of the territories) and the explosives hidden in their cars.

The two Jerusalem attacks a week apart were carried out in the same manner. Cell members drove the suicide bombers to Jaffa Road and let them off in front of City Hall, where they boarded No. 18 buses. In the first attack, the bomber waited till the bus neared the central bus station to set off his device; in the second, he did it just several dozen metres from the stop where he had gotten on.

In both cases, the explosives were carried in a handbag. Security sources said it appears the bombers were wearing army uniforms.

The suicide bomber in the Ashkelon attack was driven there from Jerusalem by cell members, who again used their Israeli identification cards and Israeli licence-plated vehicles to travel unnoticed.

The sources said several cell members were known to the GSS even before the suicide bombings. The six members not directly involved in the terror attacks are suspected of involvement in such activity as firebomb and rock throwing in the Jerusalem area.

The GSS revealed last week that it has captured Akram Rahman Salameh, a wanted fugitive and a brother of Hassan Salameh, who recruited the suicide bombers who blew themselves up in Jerusalem and Ashkelon last February.

The IDF spokesperson said Akram Salameh, 23, a Hamas activist from the Khan Yunis refugee camp, was arrested on April 22 when he returned to Gaza from Sudan.

During interrogation, the army said, he supplied a great deal of information on his brother's activities abroad, including a visit to the camp set up in Lebanon by the Hamas deportees.

Akram Salameh was one of the deportees and admitted in his interrogation that at the time, he underwent military training at a base belonging to Ahmed Jabril, the army said.

• The central elections committee issued the final official listing of parties running in the upcoming general elections, the 14th in Israel's history. Twenty-one parties will be listed on the ballot as compared to 25 in the last general election. Twelve of the parties are new. Six are religious and/or haredi. Five are Arab and/or jointly Arab and Jewish.

• The head of the General Security Service, Ami Ayalon, advised the government that terrorism against Israel has entered a new phase. It is now controlled and directed against the state of Israel by another state – Iran.

May 7

• Security forces were put on alert in search of two individuals missing from their homes in the West Bank and suspected of being on a possible terror mission in the heart of Israel.

May 8

• Various public opinion polls reported that Shimon Peres enjoys a lead of between four and five percent over Benjamin Netanyahu in the race for prime minister.

May 9

• Ha'aretz reported that a U.S. federal judge in New York has ruled that Dr. Musa Abu Marzook could be extradited to Israel. Marzook is being held in Manhattan on charges that he was the head of the Hamas cell operating out of the United States, responsible for planning a number of terrorist strikes against Israel.

May 10

• Ha'aretz reported that 31 foreign companies have invested more than $500 million in Israel's hi-tech industries within the last seven months.

Approximately 1,850 people were expected in Jerusalem to attend the International Christian Chamber of Commerce Annual Conference, the European Cable Communication Conference and the European Symposium for Lawyers.

Likud hasn't changed essential platform

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

As the Sheila Copps brouhaha illustrates, Canadian politicians risk tarnishing their integrity, such as it is, when they make extravagant claims.

Mideast Analysis

But in Israel, no such rule exists. Consider the case of Ariel Sharon, the Likud stalwart. Writing in the Jerusalem Post several months ago, Sharon stated in no uncertain terms: "If the Likud accepts the Oslo (peace) pact, it no longer has a right to exist."

Well, a lot of water has flowed under the bridge since Sharon unburdened himself of this dictum, and neither Sharon nor the Likud has paid the penalty.

Forced to react to the new realities confronting Israel on the eve of its May 29 general election, the Likud has performed a remarkable flip-flop. From opposing the Oslo agreements, the party now grudgingly accepts them as an unpalatable fact of life.

Indeed, according to a survey published in the Jerusalem Report, only six of Likud's 32 members of Knesset flatly oppose the Oslo accords. They are, among others, Yitzhak Shamir, the former prime minister; Eliahu Ben-Elissar, Israel's first ambassador to Egypt; and Benny Begin, the son of the first Likud prime minister.

In addition, Benjamin Netanyahu — the Likud leader — has had to eat crow with regard to his position on meeting personally with Yasser Arafat, PLO chieftain and Palestine Authority president.

"I will not meet with Arafat, will not grovel before him, will not chase him," Netanyahu told an interviewer on Channel 2 in early February. But since last month, when the Palestine National Council decided to delete clauses from its national covenant calling for Israel's destruction, Netanyahu has been singing a different tune.

With these alterations and its new-found emphasis on peace, the Likud, in a sense, has moderated its policy, doubtless hoping to win over undecided voters. But has the Likud changed its stripes, the basic essence of its right-wing platform? Not really.

Tactical adjustments

According to one of Netanyahu's closest associates, Tzahi Hanegbi, the son of super hawk Geula Cohen, "there is no real departure from the Likud platform and certainly not from our ideology. What we have here are tactical adjustments to a new situation ..."

In Netanyahu's view, the Oslo agreements are deeply flawed. "We strenuously and justly oppose the Oslo accords, but they created a situation which we have to face to prevent it from getting worse," he has said.

According to Netanyahu, the Likud has every intention of continuing with the peace process and of not putting it into the "deep freeze."

And while Netanyahu may sincerely believe this, Likud's platform and statements by its leading lights suggest that the peace process in its present form would probably wither should Likud win the election.

The Likud is against a Palestinian state, the supreme objective of the Palestine Authority. By contrast, the Labor party recently dropped its opposition to the concept. The Likud would create islands of Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank, a patchwork arrangement the Palestinian side would not accept under any circumstances.

In line with its Greater Israel ideology, the Likud would expand existing Jewish settlements and build new ones in the West Bank, leaving major Arab towns except Hebron in Palestinian hands. The more pragmatic Labor party would annex settlements closest to the old Green Line and pull out of Hebron, possibly retaining only its Jewish enclaves.

The Likud and the Labor party concur that united Jerusalem is Israel's indivisible capital. Sharp differences, however, are evident in other respects. The Likud would not even discuss Jerusalem in final status talks, and would close down PLO institutions like Orient House.

The Golan Heights is another point of contention between the Likud and the Labor party. Last month, the Labor party amended its platform to read that the Golan is no longer essential to Israel's security. But the Likud is still wed to the idea that the Golan should be controlled by Israel. "We will remain on the entire Golan with no cosmetic changes," said Netanyahu, precluding any realistic chances of reaching an agreement with Syria, which demands a total Israeli withdrawal.

Clearly, Netanyahu is under the impression that his "peace for peace" approach to negotiations will satisfy the Palestinians and the Syrians. But in the real world of Middle East diplomacy, Netanyahu's formula is either a cynical ploy or an exercise in naivety.

Her sister Tali, mother Gail, grandparents Max & Rose and aunts Pearl and Edyie send these messages to her.

ORLY

We miss you.
We will always love you.

Bubby and Zaidy
Aunt Pearl and Aunt Edyie

TO MY DEAR SWEET ORLY,

It's two years today since you were taken from us and not a minute goes by that I don't think of you.

I miss you and love you so desperately.

"You are the sun in someone else's sky," but you are 'my light' that will shine eternally in my heart.

I love you, dear Orly,
You are with me day and night.

Forever my sister,
Forever my light.
Forever and Always,

Tali

TO MY DAUGHTER, ORLY

Two years have
Now passed,
Twenty-four months
Since I saw you last.

I try to imagine
You today,
How you would look
What you would say

To tears that once
Were few,
Now rivers flow
When I think of you

Hard to stop once
They start,
Not from my eyes
But from my heart

But remembering also Soothes my pain,
For you are with me
Once again.

Love, Mom

The PNC resolution: historic or deceptive?

By HILLEL NEUER

Though controversy remains as to whether the Palestine National Council (PNC) actually did or did not amend its covenant, Shimon Peres' willingness to accept the April 24 PNC vote as sufficient carefully preserved the very survival of the Oslo process – and by extension, of the Labor party's election campaign.

Opinion

Equally if not more importantly, notwithstanding its dubious legal effect, the resolution symbolized the gradual acceptance of compromise in the Palestinian national mindset.

Why the controversy? Because while most of the pro-Oslo world rallied to praise Arafat for his victorious 504-54 resolution in favor of amending the covenant to conform with commitments repeatedly made to Israel, skeptics such as Likud Member of Knesset Benny Begin, reluctant to take Arafat at his word, wanted first to see the text.

But if the government of Israel had deemed the PLO to have fulfilled its contractual obligation, third-party nations like the United States were not about to reserve judgment. With a strong vested interest in the success and progress of the Middle East negotiations, surely the Clinton Administration was only too glad to see one long-standing thorn in the side of Oslo finally removed.

Similarly, in their eager rush to portray Arafat as a peacemaker, the media virtually ignored their primary responsibility to check and analyze the facts, in this case the text of the PNC resolution. Only in citing questions raised by others, such as the independent monitoring agency Peace Watch, did a few wire stories even touch on the subject, and then only cursorily. (Notable exceptions include the editorial pages of the Jerusalem Post and the Washington Times.)

What any ordinary person reading the resolution would discover is that there are two substantial problems. First, in purporting to cancel articles in the covenant considered offensive – like Article 20, which states, "Jews are not one people," or Article 22, which calls Zionism "fascist and Nazi" – not one of them is specifically enumerated; rather, making as it does only a general reference, it leaves us to guess which articles the resolution contemplates.

Second and more importantly, the orginal text of the resolution – at least as it appeared in a Voice of Palestine broadcast from the PNC session in Gaza – states that the PNC has "decided to amend" the covenant, whereas the "official" version sent to Peres states that the covenant is "hereby amended." The latter denotes that the amendment has been made, whereas the former suggests there was a decision to amend, but the amendment was not actually effected.

The suspicion that the PNC did not actually complete the amendment is supported by the resolution's mention of future drafting to be done by a legal committee, in order to create a new charter.

To be sure, all of this hair-splitting legalese should appear rather obtuse if not downright silly. That is, unless we were dealing with anyone other than Yasser Arafat: the Arafat who in 1988 "renounced," or then again maybe didn't renounce, terrorism; who in 1989 had the New York Times investigating French medieval etymology to interpret his terming the charter "caduc," a French word meaning anything from "decaying" to "deciduous;" who says his calls for jihad (holy war) are actually calls to peace; in a word, the Arafat who has proven he can make anything mean something or its very opposite, or both at the same time.

Much to Israel's chagrin, if Arafat does finally come through on an obligation, his performance is never fully satisfying. Consider the May 1994 ceremonial signing of the Cairo accords, when Arafat suddenly refused to sign, even though some of the most important world leaders were on the stage with him.

Here, too, what Peres had to deal with in the PNC resolution was a classically Arafatesque move. Many have tried to coach Arafat on which words to use – from American dove Rita Hauser to Peres – and the man must be tired of his nagging Jewish coaches. Peres was desperate for some saving gesture and was in no mood to play the stickler.

Arafat in turn managed to appease a major Israeli demand, boost Labor's election fortunes, placate important donor states and still keep the way open for future moves.

At the end of the day, the PNC move, despite valid questions, must be regarded as extremely significant if not historic. That it is being treated as such by the rejectionists – Hamas and DFLP, Syria and Iraq – indicates that the Palestinian and Arab world recognize the occurrence of some kind of deepened understanding with Israel.

Whether this apparent Palestinian reconciliation is worth encouraging through continued concessions is the difficult question Israeli voters must now decide.

Bibi backs limited Syrian pact

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israel would be better off trying to reach a limited agreement with Syria that would remove Syria from the U.S. State Department's list of countries supporting terrorism, rather than continuing with the futile effort to reach a peace treaty and normalization, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu said last week in an interview with the Jerusalem Post.

However, senior U.S. administration officials say privately that Netanyahu's approach is unworkable.

Netanyahu accused the United States of "misreading" Syria in believing the return of the Golan Heights is at the top of President Hafez al-Assad's priority list.

Instead of the "zero pressure" and "carrot-carrot" approach currently employed by the Clinton administration, Netanyahu said, the United States should warn Syria that it will impose sanctions, as it has done with Iraq and Iran, unless it expels Palestinian rejectionists and Hezbollah from areas it controls. If it does so, Israel should favor Syria's removal from the terror list and reach an unspecified limited agreement with it.

On the domestic front, Netanyahu asserted that a government under his leadership would invest more money in infrastructure, transportation, education and settlement activity in the territories.

At the same time, the government would be "weaned" from $1.2 billion of U.S. non-military assistance and would lower taxes, he said.

Hebron pullout set for mid-June

BY DAVID MAKOVSKY and JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Serivce

JERUSALEM – The IDF will redeploy in Hebron a month from now, the cabinet decided Sunday, after being informed by its top peace negotiator, Foreign Ministry Director-General Uri Savir, that the Palestinians will accept the delay.

The date was agreed upon by Savir and top Palestinian negotiator Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen) after a week of parallel military talks between OC Central Command Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan and Palestinian Police head Gen. Haj Ismail.

The IDF has already pulled out much of its equipment from the city.

Family stress linked to high youth suicide rate

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada has the third highest rate of youth suicide in the world, mainly because of the stress on families resulting from changes in society, says Dr. Paul Steinhauer, a professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and a senior staff psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Steinhauer spoke recently at the Bialik Hebrew Day School about the effects of stress on children and youth. In his talk titled, Children and Youth in the 90s: The Needy Generation, he referred to reports showing the dramatic rise in school violence and violent youth crimes — up 30 percent in 12-year-olds and 25 percent in 13-year-olds over the last year.

Dr. Paul Steinhauer

"One out of four children and youth in Ontario aren't making it," he said. "The stress on children and youth is a direct reflection of the increased stress and pressure in families, frequently attributed to the high rate of marriage breakdown — 10 times higher than in the 1950s."

He said that as a result of major technological changes "on the scale of the Industrial Revolution," 70 percent of families now require two incomes to stay above the poverty line; more children are therefore at home alone or in some kind of variable quality care. A recent report circulated by the Jewish Family and Child Services, he noted, indicates that child abuse is a real problem in all segments of the Jewish community.

"We can't abdicate our role as parents and expect government and professionals to bring up our kids for us successfully," he said. To produce a generation of healthy, competent and productive children requires time and involvement of parents, especially the father.

"Quality time is not enough. There is no quality time without quantity time." He suggested that businesses should minimize unnecessary pressures on their employees, since excess stress undermines their ability to parent.

"This will not only give them more time and energy to devote to parenting but will also decrease absenteeism and increase productivity in the work place," he said.

Government downsizing, he said, will require the community to do more for itself and to rely less on the government than in the past.

He told The CJN that we can either do what is needed to help families give their children the competence and coping skills they will need to get off to a successful start in life, or avoid doing so, "in which case we will pay later, and much more, for our short-sightedness and for the result of our and their failure."

Steinhauer is the chair of the steering committee of Voices for Children and chair of Sparrow Lake Alliance. He has published six books and numerous papers and professional journals.

A friend in need...

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a cliche that you find out who your friends are when times are bad.

Ramy and Bonnie Ganzi have discovered that they have very good friends indeed at the St. Clair West Services for Seniors.

When Ramy, only in his early 40s, was diagnosed with terminal cancer, Bonnie's friends at St. Clair, where she worked as a volunteer, raised funds to send them home to Israel, so that he could see his family one last time.

When the Ganzis came to Toronto, things appeared to be going well and they opened their own business. Unfortunately, their efforts were not successful and they suffered personal bankruptcy.

Bonnie is considered "a very special and unique volunteer" at St. Clair, where she worked with the Older Adult Centre and the Adult Day Program. A fundraising letter said that she "has befriended both the members and the staff and has truly warmed the hearts of many people with her genuine and kind nature."

When Ramy was diagnosed, the couple didn't have the money either to return to Israel or to support themselves once they got there. Their friends at St. Clair got together on a personal basis to help them out. They held a fundraising dinner and sent letters of appeal to members of the Jewish community and "to anyone we could think of," said colleague Tanya Trachtenberg.

St. Clair clients contributed also, she said, as did people from other agencies.

"There wasn't much time to organize things," Trachtenberg told The CJN. "We took things one day at a time."

Nevertheless, they were able to send the Ganzis to Israel and are still giving them financial help.

Ramy and Bonnie Ganzi have decided to stay in Israel for the time being, as he has been told he has only a few months to live.

For more information call Trachtenberg, at 787-2114.

Wheat-grass juice tested as colitis treatment

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The juice of the wheat-grass plant, found in health food stores, is being tested as a possible treatment for ulcerative colitis, a severe chronic inflammation of the large intestine and rectum that affects more than 1,500 Israelis.

The clinical trials are being carried out at the Hadassah-University Hospital in Jerusalem's Ein Kerem and are open only to sufferers of the disease who are in the midst of an acute attack, said Dr. Eran Ben-Arye, who is coordinating the research.

A preliminary study of 10 patients was completed, with eight of them reporting improvement in their condition, even though wheat-grass juice was the only change in their diet and their drug treatment had not been amended.

Ben-Arye said that the juice will be fresh, prepared by squeezing the wheat-grass. It is rich is chlorophyll, vitamins A, C and E, iron, calcium, and magnesium. A control group will receive a green-colored juice with the same taste, but not made from wheat-grass. In the double-blind, two-month study, no one will know who is getting the real thing until the results are disclosed.

Cause not known

The condition is usually diagnosed between ages 10 and 30, based on symptoms that include watery diarrhea containing varying amounts of blood, mucus and pus. The cause is not known, but it is more common among Jews of Ashkenazi origin.

Other symptoms are weight loss, anemia, pain, fever, severe intestinal pain and chills, and some patients cannot function normally. Children may suffer retarded physical growth.

Jewish groups urge Schott's removal as owner

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish organizations in Canada and the United States are calling for the removal of Cincinnati Reds owner Marge Schott from major league baseball in the wake of her comments saying Hitler merely "went too far."

"There are fans of every racial, religious and ethnic group who follow baseball," said Steven Shulman, associate national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress. "They should expect the league to attempt to remove her [Schott] from the game. I can't think of comments that would bring more discredit on the game. Clearly she's a liability for the image of baseball."

Phil Baum of the American Jewish Congress urged acting commissioner Bud Selig to "put together a committee at once to find a buyer for the team, who would make Schott an offer she can't possibly refuse and get her out of baseball's executive suites."

Meanwhile, the Toronto Blue Jays have asked Selig and the league's executive council to take action against Schott, though club president Paul Beeston would not indicate what that action should be. Beeston noted, however, that Schott was suspended for the 1993 season after she used racial and ethnic slurs against blacks and Jews.

"You would think that with the suspension she'd have learned [her lesson]," Beeston said.

Asked what further sanctions might be imposed if a suspension didn't work, Beeston replied "you can read what you want into that."

Schott's most recent case of foot-in-mouth disease came when she was asked by ESPN (sports TV) interviewer Sal Paolantonio about a swastika she keeps in her house.

"Everything you read, when he [Hitler] came in he was good," Schott said. "They built tremendous highways and got all the factories going. He went nuts, went berserk. I think his own generals tried to kill him, didn't they? Everybody knows he was good at the beginning, but he just went too far," she said.

Michael Rapp, director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Cincinnati, said, "Her remarks were outrageous. I'm personally appalled, but of all of [her] strengths, sensitivity to intergroup relations or knowledge of European history has never been among them."

Baum called Schott "a crude and thoughtless woman who has now reached a new low."

Schott's comments are "profoundly ignorant" and "offensive," said Ken Jacobson, assistant national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

Beeston called Schott's remarks "disgraceful and despicable. It shows a total lack of understanding about history."

Selig, himself Jewish and owner of the Milwaukee Brewers, said he and National League president Len Coleman were monitoring the situation.

Rapp called Selig's response "tepid. You would hope they'd do a lot more. What I want is a public recognition by Schott that what she did was hurtful and harmful and a commitment that this won't happen again," he said.

The Reds issued a statement after the controversy erupted saying Schott was sorry her remarks "offended many people ... Hitler was unquestionably one of history's most despicable tyrants."

Four years ago, the league's executive council suspended Schott for one year and fined her $25,000 because her ethnic and racial slurs brought "disrepute and embarrassment to the sport."

At the time, she agreed to participate in sensitivity training and to increase minority hiring by the Reds.

Softball tryouts set

TORONTO — Maccabi Canada is holding open tryouts for its softball team that will compete at the 15th Maccabiah Games in Israel, July 4 to 14, 1997.

Tryouts will take place at Clanton Park field, Bathurst and York Downs, on June 15 and 16, 1996 beginning at 9:30 a.m. All positions are available.

Canada's Maccabi softball team is the defending champion, having defeated its arch-rivals, the United States, at the last Maccabiah in 1993. Canada won silver at the previous two games in 1989 and '85.

About families

In previous articles, we have discussed how to prepare for a child's first camp experience. This week, we will talk about the child who suddenly refuses to attend camp and announces that he or she wants to get a summer job.

There can be nothing more disconcerting than having your child break with a long-standing pattern of behavior. Just as they rely on us for consistency and predictability, in our own way we come to rely on them. Therefore, when your teenager suddenly announces, that after years of regular camp attendance, he or she no longer wishes to attend, but rather wishes to work for the summer, we face the challenge of coping appropriately with this sudden change in attitude. How we cope with this change will determine whether the situation can be turned into an opportunity for real growth.

Just as the desire to first attend camp indicates that your child is embarking on an important developmental stage, the sudden desire to work for the summer also can be seen as a sign that your child is ready for new challenges. As with the first camp experience, your job as a parent is to help the child determine whether or not he or she is ready to take this step.

The first thing you can do is listen. Has your child developed any plans, and how realistic are those plans? Keep in mind that during the teenage years, a fairly high degree of narcissism and perceived infallibility are perfectly normal. The challenge you face as a parent is to inject a dose of realism into your child's thinking without discouraging your child's efforts to take these important steps towards maturity.

Your child will need to begin by doing a realistic inventory of his or her skills and interests. Again, a delicate balance between encouraging realism without discouraging ambition and enthusiasm has to be maintained.

The next step is to assess the opportunities that exist. In this regard, your child will need your help and advice as he or she begins the often difficult and frustrating activity of looking for a job. You can help your child learn how to market himself and how to present himself to others. You can also show him or her how to put together a job search plan, and how to set realistic and attainable goals. Most of all, your child will need your encouragement – as we all know, looking for a job more often results in failure than success, and your biggest challenge will be to help your child maintain his or her self-confidence and enthusiasm. Even an unsuccessful job search can be a valuable learning experience.

Some teens may opt to create their own jobs. You can assist these budding entrepreneurs by helping them select a field of activity (i.e. lawn care, house or pet sitting) and assisting them in marketing (i.e. flyers). Again, your key contribution will be encouragement – succeed or fail, your child should realize that initiative and ambition are always traits to be respected and nurtured.

Be sure to give your teen the space he or she needs at this point in his or her life. Plan time-outs from each other in order to avoid overexposure and to give your child the sense that you value his or her privacy.

Many teens will review the options available and determine that they are not yet ready to take this step. Some will decide to return to camp, while others will opt for a different kind of summer experience, such as a structured trip across the United States or Canada. This is a more "grown up" experience with a social benefit to boot. Parents will be relieved to find that there is excellent supervision on these trips.

For those of you with a child who is entering the job market, good luck. For those of you with a child who is returning to camp, remember – there's always next year!

ORIENTAL COLESLAW

HERB CAPLAN SELLS
1111 Weston Road [illegible] 767-1655
FOR LESS

		Dressing
3/4 cup	chopped snow peas	3 tbsp	brown sugar
3 cups	shredded green cabbage	2 tbsp	rice wine vinegar
3 cups	shredded red cabbage	2 tbsp	vegetable oil
1 cup	sliced water chestnuts	1 tbsp	soya sauce
1 cup	sliced red peppers	1 tbsp	sesame oil
3/4 cup	canned mandarin oranges, drained	1 tbsp	minced garlic
2	medium green onions, chopped	1 tsp	minced ginger root

1. Microwave snow peas until tender-crisp. Place in serving bowl with shredded cabbage, water chestnuts, red peppers, mandarin oranges and green onions; toss well to combine.
2. In small bowl whisk together brown sugar, vinegar, vegetable oil, soya sauce, sesame oil, garlic and ginger; pour over salad and toss well.

Terrorist linked to Iran

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The man who accidentally blew himself up in an east Jerusalem hotel room last month has been identified as a Hezbollah terrorist sent by Iran, apparently to blow up a plane leaving from Ben-Gurion Airport.

Last Thursday, Jerusalem District Court lifted a ban on publication of details of the investigation conducted by the Mossad, General Security Service and Jerusalem police, aided by several European security services.

"We verified that he was motivated by Iranian money and Iranian officials who sent him to try and undermine the peace process," said Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal.

"I think there is more and more evidence about the intensive Iranian activity against the peace process ... [and] an attempt to intervene in the elections in Israel," Foreign Ministry Director-General Uri Savir told Army Radio.

He said this should serve as incentive for Europe to sever what it calls its "critical dialogue" with Iran and impose economic sanctions.

Security has been tightened in recent weeks at Ben-Gurion and airports abroad, after it was discovered the suspect, Hassin Makdad, from the village of Faroun in Lebanon, carried explosives with him on at least one flight.

The case for the first time showed direct Iranian involvement and also greater complexity in planning bombing attacks, said Anat Kurtz, an expert on terrorism at Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies.

"There is an element of escalation in this. We are talking about a sophisticated operation," Kurtz said.

Makdad remains in serious condition at Hadassah-University Hospital, Ein Kerem. He lost both of his legs, one arm and sight in at least one eye in the explosion at the Lawrence Hotel in April.

Security sources identified the bomb material as RDX, a powerful plastic explosive that is diffi-

Bouchard tells leaders separatist dream will never be abandoned

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

QUEBEC CITY — Premier Lucien Bouchard last week offered the Jewish community assurance, by referring repeatedly to Quebec's steadfast commitment to preserving the province's democratic heritage and "cherished" values, and making "no distinction between communities" in a sovereign Quebec.

But the premier, meeting with a large delegation of Jewish community organizational officials at the Assemblée Nationale, also made it abundantly clear that his government had no intention of abandoning the dream of a separate Quebec.

He said the transition to sovereignty will take place in keeping with the province's democratic traditions, without the "fear of violence" or the threat of an armed "coup d'etat."

He vowed that the principles of tolerance and respect for others would continue "whether as a province, or a country.

"I won't deny there's economic apprehension," Bouchard told a 60-member "parliamentary mission" organized by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q). I hear it too much not to be aware. It's the reality, and we have to deal with the reality."

Bouchard was responding to Richard Diamond, a representative of FEDERATION CJA's Young Adult Division.

Diamond, vice-president of Canderel, a Montreal real estate development firm, told Bouchard that the province's "tremendous amount of political and economic uncertainty" was wreaking havoc with business tenancy leases.

"I see it every day," Diamond said. "Businesses renew [their leases] for only one year, because they don't know where they want to be next year. There have been tremendous repercussions."

He suggested that Bouchard had an obligation to be "much more honorable" in describing the "true costs" of Quebec separating.

While recognizing the presence of uncertainty and of having to live through a "difficult time," Bouchard blamed the situation on the failure to renew federalism, particularly the Meech Lake Accord, five years ago.

"Those who rejected it contributed to the uncertainty," he said.

"Try to put yourself in the shoes of a sovereigntist, who is despairing because there's nothing [to satisfy Quebec] in sight. We have to deal with that."

Bouchard accused Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, through his recent statements challenging

The News In Brief

International

Israel's Red Cross

OTTAWA – Canadian Jewish Congress, in a meeting with Canadian Red Cross Society, has continued its lobbying efforts for the Magen David Adom in Israel to gain offficial membership to the Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies.

Jewish Education Professor

NORTH YORK – York University has appointed the first professor of Jewish Education at a Canadian university, Dr. Alex Pomson.

He will be spearheading York's Jewish teacher education program which prepares students to become teachers of Jewish and general studies in Jewish or public schools. His appointment has been made possible by the Israel Koschitzky Family Foundation.

ISRAEL

Amir Can Vote

JERUSALEM – Israel's High Court of Justice has ruled that Yitzhak Rabin's assassin can vote in the May 29 national elections, saying that there was no clear law that calls for revoking this right.

Yigal Amir is serving a life sentence for fatally shooting the prime minister at a Nov. 4, 1995 peace rally in Tel Aviv.

Terrorist Arrested

JERUSALEM – Israeli security forces have arrested a Palestinian who was trained by a militant Islamic group based in Syria to carry out terror attacks in the Jewish state.

Salim Muhammed Abdel Banah, a Palestinian carrying a Jordanian passport, was apprehended by the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security service, in conjunction with Jerusalem police, according to reports.

Righteous Gentiles

JERUSALEM – Turkish Jews have requested that Yad Vashem recognize about a dozen Turkish diplomats who saved Jews during World War II as righteous gentiles.

The diplomats all served in Nazi-occupied Europe and personally took the initiative to save Jews, risking their lives, it was revealed by Yad Vashem officials last week.

Jordanian Memorial

JERUSALEM – A memorial may be built in Jerusalem for Jordanian soldiers who fell in the battle for Ammunition Hill in the Six Day War, according to Col. (ret.) Shimon Cahaner, director of the Ammunition Hill memorial site. Cahaner says he has tentative approval from Jordanian officials to build a memorial at the site.

Fighting Pollution

REHOVOT – New ways to combat pollution in Mediterranean countries with the aid of polymers was discussed at the MEDNET International Conference on Environmental Impact of Polymetric Materials held recently at the Weizmann Institute.

Kosher Palestinian Beer

JERUSALEM – Until now, Taybeh Beer, produced in a boutique brewery in a village near Ramallah, has been the first Palestinian beer. Now it is the first kosher Palestinian beer.

What's more, the brewery is getting its kashrut certificate from Rabbi Avraham Gisser of nearby Ofra, and the person who made it all possible is Mira Weigensberg, from Tekoa.

WORLD

E.U. Aids Palestinians

BRUSSELS – The European Commission has approved a grant of $18.5 (US) million to the Palestinian Authority.

The money is intended to fund in part the operating budgets of Palestinian universities and colleges in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

It also will ensure that more than 30,000 students can continue full-time study for the rest of this year, said a spokesperson for the European Union's executive body,

Cultural Ties

LOS ANGELES – In a major effort to boost cultural ties between Israel and the western United States, the Israeli government co-hosted a conference at the University of Denver in Colorado last weekend.

BB Slashes Budget

NEW YORK — B'nai Brith International plans to slash $2 million (US) from next year's annual budget, with a hefty portion of that cut expected to hit two programs targeted at youth: Hillel and the B'nai Brith Youth Organization.

Nevertheless, the impact on Hillel, the college campus program, is not likely to be dramatic, because B'nai Brith provides less than 10 percent of Hillel's $22.5 million annual income.

WORLD WIDE WEB

Internet Project

JERUSALEM – Almost three years ago, the World Zionist Organization's student and academic department launched the Internet Project. Today it includes over 3,500 subscribers and over 10,000 files downloaded per month from its Web site and gopher. To access the site contact [www.wzo.org.il].

Bible Lands Museum Launches Exhibition

JERUSALEM – In celebration of Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary, the Bible Lands Museum of Jerusalem is presenting a premiere exhibition titled: Jerusalem – A Capital for all Times: Royal Cities of the Biblical World.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert has designated the display, on until the end of December, as the primary museum exhibition for this year's year of celebrations.

For the show, eight capitals of the biblical world have been reconstructed in detail through historial models. The exhibition depicts Jerusalem during the First Temple period, comparing it with seven other great capitals of the ancient world.

Former Torontonians Dr. Elie and Batya Borowski are the founders of the museum, which will celebrate its fourth anniversary on May 30 with a gala dinner honoring former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek on his 85th birthday.

Attempt to influence judge should end case: lawyer

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The lawyer for an alleged Nazi war criminal launched into a blistering denunciation of the federal Justice Department last week, suggesting a first-year law student, a transit driver or even a welder would know better than to attempt to influence a judge.

Lawyer Donald Bayne said a letter from Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice Ted Thompson to Chief Justice Julius Isaac of the Federal Court and Isaac's subsequent talk with Associate Chief Justice James Jerome were so improper as to undermine any perception of fairness in the case.

"It's enough that the attempt was made to interfere in the associate chief justice's wholly independent handling of the case," he said. As a result, "the only thing commensurate with the violation is a stay."

Jerome was the presiding judge in a case involving three alleged Nazi war criminals, Johann Dueck (Bayne's client), Helmut Oberlander and Erichs Tobiass. Federal authorities are seeking to strip them of their citizenship and deport them for lying about their wartime activities.

The letter from Thompson to Isaac suggested that unless the pace of proceedings was stepped up, the government would make a reference to the Supreme Court to get a quick decision on outstanding legal issues.

But it does not matter what was discussed between Thompson and Isaac, Bayne argued. The very fact there was a meeting, and that Isaac subsequently contacted Jerome, is enough to shake the public's confidence in the judicial system.

A first-year law student would know better than to try to influence a judge. "I'll go farther. The average guy driving [for the] TTC knows that. Welders know that. [Thompson] didn't know that," Bayne said.

Last week, three days of court time that had originally been designated for legal arguments on technical issues were devoted to the stay application. Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen has taken over from Jerome in the case.

Bayne unleashed his considerable advocacy skills by arguing the correspondence shows that Thompson tried, through the chief justice, to get Jerome to change his approach to the denaturalization cases, since he was unhappy with the decisions Jerome had made.

In that situation, the natural public perception would be of powerful forces pulling strings behind the scenes and of a justice system that is not independent of the political system. Bayne asked how "the little guy" would perceive the principle of judicial independence when "the rich and mighty" can "get in the back door and turn the screws on the little guy."

While legal arguments dragged on last week, one interested observer at the hearing was lawyer Barbara Jackman. Jackman is representing alleged Nazi war criminal Joseph Nemsila in a separate deportation matter before Judge Jerome.

She told The CJN she had not decided whether she too would raise a request for a stay, though she added there were similarities in the cases.

Proceedings began last week with three requests for intervener status by B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, Ken Narvey on behalf of the Coalition of Concerned Congregations and the German Canadian Congress (GCC). Cullen turned down the requests, saying the applicants did not have any unique expertise to offer the court.

Eric Hafemann, lawyer for the GCC, said the congress believes "the whole court has been compromised" by interference from the Justice Department. The GCC is alarmed by "political intervention" in the case, he added.

Two of those before the court, Oberlander and Dueck, are ethnic Germans.

Meanwhile, while four of the six ongoing war crimes cases in Canada hover on the brink of oblivion, the U.S. Office of Special Investigation (OSI) announced that a Florida man who admitted serving in a Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian battalion has agreed to relinquish his citizenship and has left the country.

Juozas (Joseph) Budreika, 79, admitted he served in the 2nd/12th Lithuanian Schutzmannscaft Battalion. During 1941 and 1942, the battalion murdered thousands of unarmed Jews and other civilians in Lithuania and Byelorussia (now Belarus). Budreika has returned to Lithuania.

Since the OSI began operations in 1979, 53 Nazi "persecutors" have been stripped of their U.S. citizenship and 46 have been removed from the country.

1941 document links Kalejs to Arajs Kommando

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 1941 document signed by a physician of the Latvian Security Auxiliary Police that certified to the good health of Konrads Kalejs was submitted to immigration adjudicator Anthony Iozzo last week, as Kalejs' immigration hearing continued.

The certificate was the latest in a series of wartime documents that link Kalejs with the Security Auxiliary Police, more commonly known as the Arajs Kommando. The Kommando was notorious for instigating a bloody anti-Jewish pogrom in Riga in the summer of 1941 that killed 400, and for subsequently participating with German forces in the mass shootings of 30,000 Jews.

The document certifies that Kalejs, "lieutenant of the Security Auxiliary Police" is free of disease in accordance with the rules of admission at the Latvian University.

Several documents tendered earlier at Kalejs' immigration hearing also place Kalejs in the Arajs Kommando, named after its fanatically anti-Jewish leader, Viktors Arajs.

However, in cross-examination, Kalejs' co-counsel Lloyd MacIlquham attempted to discredit those documents.

MacIlquham suggested to Holocaust historian Konrad Kwiet that Arajs might have forged those documents. When Kwiet disagreed, MacIlquham asked why he could accept that Arajs was a mass murderer but not a forger.

"This is the basic essence of genocidal campaigns," Kwiet responded.

As an officer of the security police, Arajs would be held responsible for forgeries, he added.

Later, defence co-counsel Win Thompson suggested to Kwiet that the Soviets were adept at forging documents. Kwiet agreed that Soviet security agencies, among others, had personnel trained in that skill.

Kwiet also agreed with Thompson's suggestion that witnesses in Soviet trials might come under "undue pressure" from Soviet authorities. He said he knew of a few cases involving Latvian and Lithuanian witnesses who recanted their testimony after the case was heard, saying they were forced to make statements under pressure. (However, no connection has been made between that situation and the Kalejs hearing.)

In later questioning by Justice Department lawyer Donald MacIntosh, Kwiet said the wartime documents he has studied were authored by Germans, confiscated by the Soviets and then deposited in archives. He said he did not believe they were Soviet forgeries.

The hearing was adjourned after a defence attempt to call a witness out of order ran into a roadblock. After the defence announced the witness did not want her name publicly revealed due to "embarrassment," Bill Dunphy, a reporter for the Toronto Sun objected. After consulting with his editor, he placed his objections on the record and would not agree to shield her name. The CJN, the only other media present, agreed to voluntarily refrain from identifying the witness.

The case adjourned for possible legal arguments on that issue. It is scheduled to resume on May 27.

Sounds of battle punctuate visit to Israel's north

By HENRY CAMPBELL
Special to The CJN

There was an eerie absence of human activity and sound as we drove through the towns of northern Israel. Occasionally, we would hear a muffled explosion and then the pounding of artillery returning fire. Apart from army vehicles, maintenance trucks and supply trucks off-loading food for those who had not been evacuated, we saw little else.

"Why are you here?" we were frequently asked in the bomb shelters.

As participants last month in the 1996 UJA Federation Prime Minister's Mission to Russia and Israel, we had come to see the human side of those countries. What we saw was the part of the story the TV news never seems to cover.

Not far from Kiryat Shmonah, and out of the range of the Katyushas, we visited temporary classrooms where children from the evacuated towns and villages of the north continued their studies and showed little concern that they had to travel extra distances to get there. "We are staying further south for now," said one, "but soon this will be over and then we will go home."

Visiting with Israeli troops stationed in Israel's north

We visited Grade 6 students studying English and the teacher encouraged us to speak to them. What did they think of all this, we asked. We got the answer: "It's the innocent people who are dying in Lebanon ... that's what makes us sad."

Late in the afternoon, as we were leaving our bus to visit yet another shelter, we heard a high whirring sound. Before we could react, there was a huge explosion about 1,000 yards to our left. The muffled sounds of battle we had heard earlier in the day were now closer.

Once we were inside the shelter, we were immediately engulfed by the warmth and understanding of those who have learned to take all this in stride.

As our bus finally left that evening and made its way south, we sat in silence pondering the question we had been asked by the children, the volunteers and the soldiers: "Why are you here?"

In our hearts, we knew the answer. There was nowhere else to be.

Germany winning fight against extremism: Bubis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Germany is winning the battle against right-wing extremism, says Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

Due to Germany's rigorous laws against racial incitement, and to a series of law enforcement measures taken by the authorities, violent neo-Nazi incidents have declined by 50 percent in the past year, said Bubis, who was here at the invitation of Canadian Jewish Congress and the Goethe Institute.

But Bubis, a concentration camp survivor, is not certain whether the downward trend of neo-Nazi violence will continue.

Germany's current high unemployment rate — the highest since the Depression — may have an eventual effect on the overall situation, he warned in an interview at the home of the German consul general in Toronto.

Right-wing radicalism does not pose a danger to German democracy, according to Bubis.

"We've never had in Germany such a resilient democracy as now. The young German generation is a democratic one, and has learned something from the past."

Bubis disclosed that anti-Semitic incidents, invariably perpetrated by neo-Nazis, have decreased by about 25 percent in the last two years.

Nevertheless, he still receives a steady stream of anti-Semitic letters.

Bubis said he has not drawn firm conclusions from the recent discovery of a mortar and a shell aboard an Iranian freighter bound for Hamburg. Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres recently claimed that Iran — an opponent of the Oslo peace process — is shipping weapons to Germany intended for attacks on Jewish and Israeli institutions.

"We can't say for sure whether the weapons were to be used against the Jewish community," said Bubis.

Until now, Jews in Germany have never been the targets of Iranian terrorism, he noted.

Bubis does not oppose Germany's "critical dialogue" with Iran, one of its biggest trading partners in the Middle East.

But he believes the German government should not shrink from publicly castigating Iran as a sponsor of terrorism.

Bubis, who is also president of Frankfurt's Jewish community, said there are 50,000 registered Jews and another 5,000 to 10,000 unregistered Jews in Germany today.

Approximately 45,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union have arrived in Germany since 1990 and about half are Jewish, said Bubis, a native of Breslau.

Many of the new Jewish immigrants "know nothing" about Judaism and suffer from joblessness, he said.

He expects 4,000 to 5,000 Jewish newcomers from the former Soviet Union to settle in Germany each year for at least the next few years.

Asked what he thought of the recent appointment of Germany's first female rabbi, Bubis was clearly ambivalent.

Ignatz Bubis

"I am not against her existence or her work," said Bubis, referring to Bea Wyler, a Reform rabbi who was rejected for membership by the German rabbinical conference. "It's a free country, and I have no problem with Reform people. But I, personally, would not go to a Reform synagogue, whether the rabbi was male or female."

Although Bubis does not consider himself an Orthodox Jew, he belongs to an Orthodox congregation. "I'm not strictly kosher," he said, "but I expect my rabbi to be strictly kosher."

Bubis expressed satisfaction that construction of a national Holocaust memorial in Berlin will begin on Jan. 27, 1999. Last year, the German government designated Jan. 27 as a day of commemoration for the victims of Nazi persecution.

He said he hopes the planned monument will be inscribed with the names of concentration camps where Jews perished rather than with the names of its victims.

Riverdale Shul finds permanent home

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A strip of the Danforth lined with souvlaki restaurants and sidewalk cafes may be an unorthodox setting for an Orthodox congregation, but this east-end neighborhood is now the permanent home of the Riverdale Shul.

This month the shul's board of directors signed a lease on a second storey space at 179A Danforth Ave.

The 2-year-old congregation had been leading a nomadic existence. Friday night services have been held at the home of documentary film-maker Simcha Jacobovici, founder of the shul, with Shabbat services at a local public health clinic. Two Greek restaurants donated space for High Holy Day services.

To raise money for the renovations and rent on the new premises, the shul will be holding a gala benefit featuring guitarist Aaron Skitri and Sephardi vocalist Charly Sibony on May 26, at 8 p.m. at the Music Hall, 147 Danforth Ave. Jacobovici will also screen his recent film, Expulsion and Memory: Descendants of the Hidden Jews.

The theme of the movie — the hidden Jews — is apropos for the neighborhood, Jacobovici said. "There's been no organized Jewish community here in Riverdale. We've had a hidden existence."

Jewish people in this community may have a low profile, but there are at least 100 Jewish families in the area. Records show that in the last four years some 60 families — many of the couples are intermarried — have used the local Hebrew heritage program run by the Toronto Board of Education.

According to figures provided by the shul, 300 people attended High Holy Day services this year, while community Chanukah and Purim parties drew more than 100 people each.

Jacobovici envisions the new space for the shul as a centre for the entire Riverdale Jewish community, he said. "The sign on the door will be the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre. It will be open to everyone."

The shul will have access to the space at designated times, but he insists the centre will be available to the community for other uses like education and family programming.

In addition to the new Riverdale Shul, another group of area residents has begun forming a more egalitarian organization and will be holding its first event, a Shavuot Oneg Shabbat on May 24.

Jacobovici is aware that there is a division in the community, but he's optimistic that the differences will be resolved as the community centre develops, he said.

"I think it's great a new group is forming. We're a small community, but we have complex needs. It's exciting. A place where there was little Jewish life, is now bubbling with Jewish activity and debate."

For information about the gala benefit, call 416-504-6662.

Reform body rejects double track education

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Double track education for children of interfaith couples is not acceptable, according to a resolution adopted at the recent biennial convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (Reform) in Atlanta (UAHC).

Enrolment in Reform religious schools should be open only to children who are not receiving formal religious education in any other religion, the resolution stated.

During the hot debate and close vote on the resolution, the rabbi at a temple in Syracuse, N.Y., said he discovered six weeks prior to a bar mitzvah that the boy was concurrently preparing to receive first Communion in a Catholic church.

"While the UAHC is sensitive to the challenges interfaith couples face when raising their children, it does not want to condone a two-pronged approach that might lead a child to an identity crisis," said Jessie Caryll, Outreach coordinator, Canadian Council of Reform Judaism.

"At the same time it is the Commission on Reform Outreach's mandate to provide learning experiences and emotionally warm welcomes that might prompt a non-Jewish spouse to become a Jew-by-Choice and at the very least, to endorse raising his or her child in the Jewish faith."

Caryll said Rabbi Sheldon Ezrick pleaded at the assembly "to give us strong boundaries so people can know whether they are in or out of Judaism."

Ontario govt., Yad Vashem honor survivors

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the fourth consecutive year, the Ontario government and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem joined last week to honor Holocaust survivors who have made significant contributions to life in this province.

Eight survivors were presented with specially inscribed scrolls at a Queen's Park ceremony attended by Ontario Premier Mike Harris and Citizenship Minister Marilyn Mushinski.

Also on hand were Attorney General Charles Harnick, interim NDP leader Bud Wildman, Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter and Israel's consul general, Jehudi Kinar, as well as Jewish communal leaders.

The theme of this year's ceremony was From Generation to Generation — Never Again, said Canadian Society for Yad Vashem chair Hank Rosenbaum.

The survivors represent a broad spectrum of activity in business, the arts and academia. Louis White, Efiam Multianer, Joseph Klasner, George Horvath, Katherine Horvath, Tom Newman, Ada Hefter and Leo Druckmaler were congratulated by Harris.

In his comments, the premier recounted how, as a former teacher and school trustee, he found it "sad" that the lessons of the Holocaust were not being as well transmitted among non-Jews in the public schools as among Jews.

Harris recalled his visit to Yad Vashem in Jerusalem two years ago, and advocated using "every tool" to teach about the Holocaust.

Kinar said he found the ceremony especially moving because during World War II, he had been hidden in the Dutch underground as a young child, not to be reunited with his parents until the age of five.

Moments later in the legislature, Harnick, Kwinter and Wildman each rose to praise the honorees and recall the Holocaust.

Said Harnick: "Without the memories and testaments of the survivors and their families, this horror might be allowed to fade into the pages of history, which it must never be allowed to do if we are to ensure that it never happens again.

"As a people and as a nation, we cannot allow the world to forget, as once again the horror of 'ethnic cleansing' is visited upon the world."

Kwinter noted "a growing body of literature that even denies the Holocaust happened. I challenge all of us here today to take a look at the eight [honorees] in the Speaker's gallery, and face them and tell them that the horrors they experienced and the viewing of their families being slaughtered and being separated, tell them that it didn't happen."

Wildman recounted for the house that after a personal tragedy in his own family, he was visited by a Holocaust survivor, who said his survival was "an accident."

To Wildman, "That brought home what it meant to be a survivor."

Police seize weapons

TORONTO — Metro police last week seized a cache of arms in a raid on a private North York home.

But they say that two signs referring to the Ku Klux Klan found outside the house were just "a joke made in extremely bad taste."

Detectives discovered a grenade, four hunting rifles, an AK-47 assault rifle and about six handguns in a safe inside the bungalow, in the Sheppard Ave.-Senlac Rd. area.

One person has been charged with 11 counts of weapons-related offences, Det.-Const. Gary Grinton of 32 Division told The CJN.

He discounted any links to white supremist groups, saying the signs were a prank played on the owner.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, says it received calls of protest after a Toronto Star article on the raid said the house is next to Chosen People Ministries, which the paper said is "a privately run Jewish organization."

In fact, Chosen People Ministries is a fundamentalist Christian organization with a track record of trying to convert Jews, said CJC's Bernie Farber.

Absurd and alarming

The conclusions in the report are absurd and alarming. Quebec's Chief Electoral Officer Pierre F. Côté reported last week that the referendum law had been violated by both separatists and federalists. Separatist scrutineers in four Montreal ridings, he said, had perpetrated a fraud upon an unusually high number of voters by illegally rejecting their properly completed No-to-separation ballots. However, he found no evidence of a widespread campaign.

Côté also concluded that 18 companies and individuals, including nine from outside Quebec, had violated the referendum law by exceeding its spending limits when they assisted Canadians from all parts of the country to travel to Montreal to attend the emotional unity rally held on the Friday before the vote.

That Côté decided Canadians helping Canadians to demonstrate their love of country violated the law, is absurd. But that he viewed the travel subsidy to have been "more harmful to the democratic system" than the voter fraud, is alarming.

It alarms us because it pays no heed whatsoever to the "democratic system" we call Canada.

The referendum was not without its context. It was not a consultation about merely local matters. It was intended by its sponsors to bear the most severe of all possible political consequences for the rest of Canada. Why then, do Quebec's chief electoral officer and others in Quebec think that the rest of Canada would have been indifferent to the outcome or, more to the point, uninvolved in the process? At every turn, separatists and indeed, all Canadians, should be reminded that separation affects Canada as much as it affects Quebec. Canadians, therefore, are entitled to act in defence of the country.

Premier Frank McKenna of New Brunswick eloquently, if politely, expressed our disbelief at the Côté report when he said: "All Canadians are somewhat stunned that we are assumed to have no role or interest in the future of Canada ... To suggest that we have no right to participate or no say is very disturbing."

Disturbing, absurd and alarming.

Waiting for the sounds

Israeli police last week filled in the details of a mysterious incident that occurred in a hotel in east Jerusalem on April 12. Hassin Mohammed Hussein Mikdad lost both legs and a hand when a bomb he was making blew up in his hotel room. Apparently he had been recruited, trained and sent by Hezbollah, the agents of Iran, to commit yet another atrocity in Israel. His instructions were to blow up an El Al airplane.

This revelation, along with the Katyusha rocketing of recent weeks, demonstrates Iran's reinvigorated determination to play a role in unfolding political events involving Israel. It also shows the lengths to which it is prepared to go in attempting to influence the outcome of the election in Israel.

Everyone knows that the terrorist organizations will try to strike inside Israel before the election. Their aim is first, to kill Jews, second, to intrude their blood-soaked hands into the election process and third, to put an end to the possibility of peace. It is a sorry and sickening comment about these individuals, their organizations and the countries directing them, that they hold onto murder as their chief instrument and cause.

By the same token, it is an inspiring and rallying comment about the people of Israel that they go about their lives and participate in democracy's most important activity, edgy but relatively calm, knowing the terrorists' jagged, deadly instrument hangs over their heads. Like a taut muscle waiting to absorb a blow, the entire country is braced, awaiting the awful sounds of the explosion, the sirens, the ambulance, the sobbing and the anger.

We pray those sounds won't be heard, ever again.

Ethiopian Jews still await rescue

In The CJN (May 9) Ron Csillag wrote about "Tougher Affirmative Action Laws urged for Israel." This is just the tip of the problem facing Ethiopians in Israel. Ethiopians are encountering difficulty with housing, education, the army and absorption. On the positive side, the Israeli government is finally acknowledging the existence of these problems and beginning to take action. Jews in the Diaspora are equally responsible for this community, as we were the driving force in bringing these Jews to freedom!

I know that, in time and with efforts both here and in Israel, the Israeli community of Ethiopian Jews will hopefully overcome the "challenges they are presently faced with," said Avraham Neguise, director of South Wing to Zion in Israel.

The concern, sadness and injustice is for those who have been left behind. Why concern? The Israeli government has said there are no Jewish Ethiopians left in Ethiopia. And yet other sources, the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry, the Israeli Ethiopian organization, South Wing to Zion, Rabbi Waldman, members of the Orthodox National Religious Party and many other credible sources disagree with the Israeli government about those left behind.

The government of Ethiopia has finally dropped its quota for emigration of Ethiopian Jews, but Israel now has a quota of 100 Ethiopian immigrants a month. The story goes on and on, the pain and suffering, children dying, lack of food, lack of medical treatment, broken families, broken promises. Our Jewish publicity shows kessim smiling, Ethiopian children playing in Jerusalem. But nowhere do we see the other side of the picture. Why?

There is no shame in having problems, only in denying their existence.

Viva's right to date only Jews

Re "Defending my Jewish ethnicity" (CJN, April 18).

I was both saddened and intrigued by Viva Press' account of her experience with the fellow student who called her a racist for only wanting to date other Jews.

My advice to Viva is that the next time she is accused of being a racist, she should ask if this accusation only applies to Caucasians. Would a Jamaican who only wanted to date Jamaicans be a racist? And what about Japanese or Muslims who only want to date people of similar backgrounds? Are they racist? Or are they simply exercising their right to chose who they associate with?

Cemetery in Slovakia in disrepair

My grandfather and great-grandfather were buried before the war in the cemetery in Sebes, Slovakia (a town near Presov). Last year, in honor of the 50th year since liberation, my mother took her children to see where she came from. The worst point for her emotionally was to see the disrepair of the cemetery in Sebes. She would very much like to restore this cemetery and is interested in contacting anyone who has family members buried there.

Disputes CJC's right to speak for all Jews

I have received a copy of the Report of the Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) ad hoc bylaw review committee, dated March 31. At the top of page 15, it reads: "CJC is seen as the 'parliament of Canadian Jewry.' It speaks in the name of the Jewish community on many important issues."

This Jew takes exception to such presumption.

I submit that the term "parliament" is a misnomer, and I propose that it be discontinued in future. The total absence of an opposition, the total absence of public debate and the total absence of voting rights among Canadian Jews (save for 2,000 who attend a plenary) make a mockery of the term "parliament of Canadian Jewry." Also to be considered in a debate on this subject should be the monolithic aspects of Congress, particularly in reference to its arbitrary decision making.

Shavuot marks formative event of Jewish people

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

The central text of the holiday of Shavuot is the story of the revelation at Mount Sinai, and of the words that our ancestors heard spoken from the fiery mountain. This was the formative event of the Jewish people, the reason that we Jews have had such a singular and unique identity.

The average person, when asked to list the major contributions of Judaism to western civilization, would likely put the Ten Commandments that were recited on this occasion at or near the top of that list. In other words, most people these days think of the Ten Commandments as a universal text, a text that might once have typified Judaism but is now part of the shared heritage of all cultured western people. Doesn't the entire western world renounce murder and perjury, theft and idolatry?

In fact, the name that people assign to the text these days, the Ten Commandments, isn't the real Jewish name. The Bible's own name for the text, aseret ha-daverim (Exodus 34:28), or the later Hebrew name, aseret ha-dibberot, does not mention "commandments" at all. The "10 sayings" (or Decalogue) would be a more accurate English version of the Hebrew name. The first so-called commandment, "I am the Lord, your God," hardly commands anything. In fact, if one counts commandments per se — dos and don'ts — in the traditional manner, one doesn't find 10 here. In Moses Maimonides' Sefer ha-mitzvot (Book of Commandments), one finds that the Decalogue actually consists of 14 mitzvot (commandments).

But aside from the technicality of the precise name of the text, isn't the content of the Decalogue universally accepted? Doesn't just about everybody observe the Ten Commandments? Actually, they do not.

Most people to be sure do at least pay lip service to the idea that perjury, theft, murder, adultery and idolatry are to be avoided. The idea that parents should be honored is a truism of our society. But one of the Ten Commandments relates to the Sabbath — forbidding all types of labor and commanding us to do symbolic actions to commemorate the way God created the world.

What do people mean when they say, "I may not be religious but I observe the Ten Commandments?" Generally what they mean is that they are committed to ethical behavior, but they do not find ritual to be meaningful to them. And they make the assumption — the false assumption — that the Ten Commandments is a text that contains only ethics and not ritual law.

The distinction between ethics and ritual is not a modern innovation. It can be found in many ancient societies, for example in ancient Rome and in ancient Babylon. But the distinction is not a Jewish one. One of the central messages of the Ten Commandments — and of all the law collections in our Torah — is that ethics and ritual are not separable. The Torah refuses to separate these realms and to present us with a ritual-free collection of ethical maxims.

To be sure, the Ten Commandments comes closer to that pure "ethics model" than any other unit of text in the Torah. Only one "commandment," the fourth one to "Remember the Sabbath," would be naturally categorized as a ritual.

Probably that was the reason that a number of "rebel" groups in Judaism who have opposed rabbinic law and its emphasis on ritual have tried to rally around the Ten Commandments. The most famous example is the early Jewish-Christians.

Drawing from Pictures Of The Bible, illustrated by Gustave Doré

Rabbinic texts teach us that before the first century, the Ten Commandments not surprisingly held a place of honor in Jewish liturgy and were recited in the Temple in Jeursalem on a daily basis. But, the rabbis say, the custom was abolished. The reason for this change in liturgy is described in a cryptic comment in the Talmud. It was done "because of the murmurings of the heretics" (mi-pene tar'omet ha-minim).

The standard explanation of that Talmudic line is that various heretical Jewish groups — presumably the early Christians but perhaps others too — used the Ten Commandments to prove their religious bona fides. These "heretics" argued that while they may have abandoned some traditional rituals, they were truly loyal to the ostensible core of Judaism — the Ten Commandments. The early Christians soon enough had abandoned most Jewish rituals — the rules of kosher food, circumcision, family purity. But they continued to "Remember the Sabbath." To be sure, their Sabbath differed in many ways from the Shabbat of the rabbis. Nevertheless, early Christians could and did claim that they too turned the Sabbath into a ritual observance.

Accordingly, one of the many tactics used by the classical rabbis to try to counteract the spread of the "Christian heresy" was to de-emphasize the Ten Commandments, the text that the early Christians saw as proving their own allegiance to the core of Judaism. Without the Ten Commandments as Judaism's core text, recited alongside of the Shema in the Temple every day, the heretics' argument loses its force and their practice loses its validity.

Yet despite the early rabbinic attempts to de-emphasize the Ten Commandments, Jews have continued to venerate that text and to see it as a core text of Judaism. The Talmud itself records that more than one (unsuccessful) attempt was made to reinstitute the custom of reciting the Ten Commandments in the daily liturgy. Jews, both heterodox and orthodox, continued over the generations to see this text as the crucial Jewish law code.

The attraction to the Ten Commandments must be seen as connected in part to the dramatic story of how our forefathers received these laws. But part of the uniqueness and the appeal of this text might also be in the style of the laws.

So much of biblical law is written in casuistic form: "If the following happens, then this is what you should do." In fact, that is the way that most if not all law codes work. There is a certain grandeur and majesty to the strong, unequivocal statements of the Decalogue — "Do this! Do not do that!"

But there is something deeper about the attraction of the Decalogue to people who look at the world through Jewish eyes. The content of the Decalogue may not be unique, but the legal theory underlying it is clearly Jewish.

Generally, we who live in the west at the end of the 20th century have all accepted the legal theory that emphasizes individual rights. When challenged to provide a rationale for any restriction that is put on an individual's behavior, we say: "Such and such an activity is forbidden because it infringes on the rights of some other individual." In other words, the reason that we consider theft wrong is because of the victim's right to own his own money. The reason that we consider trespass immoral is because of the victim's right to privacy.

Legal theorists have shown that Judaism has managed to build a remarkable system of morality and law without the use of the concept of rights. The theory of the Jewish legal system is based on obligations, on mitzvot. The reason that an individual must refrain from theft or trespass is because he or she has been commanded by God to refrain from those activities.

In Canada, the core text of our legal system is the Charter of Rights and Freedom. All law must conform to those standards, which guarantee that various rights will be preserved. In Judaism, the core legal text is the Decalogue, which outlines obligations — not rights — that apply to every Jew.

Is there really a difference between a legal system based on rights and a legal system based on obligations? When the issue is theft or trespass, the difference appears to be one of semantics only. What difference does it make if we outlaw theft based on the victim's right to own property or based on the criminal's obligation to refrain from taking what isn't his? If I fail to pay my workers on time, does it matter if one says, in the Canadian way, that I have infringed their rights, or if I say, in the Jewish way, that I have failed to live up to my obligation to pay workers expeditiously (Deuteronomy 24:15)?

In the cases of theft or trespass or paying one's workers, the distinction between rights and obligations is not critical. But there is a world of difference between a legal system that is based on rights and a legal system that is based on obligations.

Our western legal systems regularly grapple with numerous problems that are a result of basing all laws on the idea of rights and freedoms. For example, on some level we all feel that lying is bad or that coming to the aid of an accident victim is a requirement for any just citizen. But when legal systems are based on the concept of rights and freedoms, we have no way of outlawing lying — or any other victimless crime — unless one can prove that the lie infringed on another person's rights. And we have no straightfoward way of obligating a citizen to come to the aid of an accident victim, or to be kind and compassionate to the underprivileged, or to feed the starving or clothe the naked. We tell ourselves in the west that such "duties" are only (?) ethical duties, and that we cannot legislate morality.

Judaism has never accepted such thinking. Our tradition teaches us that the requirement that we refrain from murder and the requirement that we give charity both come from the same source. They are both based on the sense of obligation.

The Decalogue tries to get across that message. The same text that teaches us not to steal and not to murder also legislates values that western law codes do not and cannot address — honoring parents or commemorating creation. In the Decalogue, we learn that we Jews have obligations that are not limited simply to refraining from abridging somebody else's rights and freedoms.

So when we think about the Decalogue, we ought to think about it as a Jewish text. Our people, to be sure, have taught many things to the western world. And in some senses, many of the "Ten Commandments" have become part of the values of our secular society. But the crucial lesson of the Decalogue — that Jews have obligations, that law for us is not simply a matter of rights and freedoms — is something that we Jews should not forget.

The final countdown

By Shira Herzog

This article will appear one week before the Israeli election, and even then, it will be difficult to predict the outcome. At the risk of being proven wrong, I hereby offer some random observations on the last days of the campaign of 1996.

The new electoral system will not diminish the intensity of coalition negotiations. Indeed, many observers have wryly commented on the "dual track" of courting the small parties, especially the religious ones. First, before the election — and with a view to the direct election of the prime minister — Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu have been wooing the haredi voters with promises to their rabbinic leaders. After the election, the second round of negotiations will begin, this time, led by the elected prime minister.

The only difference in the new system is the advantage to the newly elected prime minister, who will be "the only game in town." And if the potential coalition partners demand a price that is higher than he is prepared to pay, the ball will go back to the voters' court. If a majority of Knesset members do not vote in support of the proposed cabinet, new elections will be called. In the view of supporters of the new system, this is the deterrent factor that will persuade enough parties to join a cabinet representing a majority in the Knesset.

This may be wishful thinking. Since this is the first election in the new system, there are no useful precedents that will help to accurately anticipate the results. Twenty-one parties are registered, and when it comes to the vote for party lists, many votes get dissipated on small parties that never make it past the 1.5 percent threshold.

In the prime ministerial race, the spread remains steady at four to five points in Peres' favor. However, Israelis themselves believe that external events may dictate the results. A majority of Israelis — including Likud voters — believe that Peres will win the race, but a significant percentage — including Labor voters — also believe that if there is a terrorist attack a few days before the election, Netanyahu will win. Some Israelis have described these last days as a nerve-wracking waiting game to see if the campaign will conclude with relative quiet.

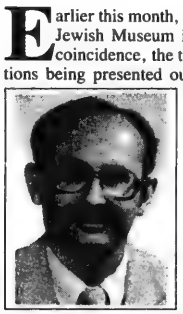
Israel's Arab minority has been the subject of a great deal of scrutiny in the last few weeks. This is a significant bloc of votes: of 450,000 eligible voters, 360,000 are expected to vote. Since the fighting in Lebanon, and especially since the shelling of Kana, Arab voters who were expected to favor Peres over Netanyahu have become reticent and even cynical. The concern in Labor is that Arabs will abstain in protest over the government's actions in Lebanon. This, in turn, would mean a net loss for Peres.

Interestingly, a recent poll on Arab attitudes to voting paints a less politicized picture of Arab voters' motivations. The poll, conducted by Tel Aviv University's Dayan Centre, found that for 78 percent of those polled, the most important factor in determining their choice of party is the perception of its ability to further socio-economic equality for the Arab community. Seventy per cent stated that a party's ability to further the Arab community's civic political status was the most important factor in their choice of party. Issues of national identity ranked low for almost all those questioned. In other words, Arabs, like many other voters, are voting on "bread and butter issues." Since 85 percent of those polled indicated that the Labor party had performed best on these issues, it is safe to predict that the Arab vote will go to Peres after all.

In the last weeks of an Israeli election campaign, the candidates virtually disappear from direct television and press coverage, and the popular game of jingles and television advertising takes over. In a significant departure from our Canadian experience, no live interviews or press statements are allowed by the leading candidates. Instead, they issue press releases and try to generate news stories that will refer to them indirectly.

This time, due to the scars of the Rabin assassination, the ads are more moderate in tone than in previous campaigns. Israeli pollsters believe that they will reinforce the views of the decided voters, rather than sway the undecided. And it is these undecided that will swing the vote to its ultimate result. My prediction: a close Peres victory, barring a significant terrorist attack just before the election. If elected, Peres will form a government, although with considerable difficulty in coalition negotiations. And if I'm wrong, remember that it is very difficult to predict anything about the Middle East, especially about the future ...

How Jewish is 'too Jewish'



By Morton Weinfeld

Earlier this month, I paid a visit to the Jewish Museum in New York. By coincidence, the two special exhibitions being presented outlined clearly the dilemmas facing western Jews who seek to integrate their Jewishness into the modern world.

The first exhibition consisted of several dozen early paintings by Marc Chagall from the period 1907 to 1917. These paintings were heavily suffused with Jewish images, personalities and themes, and dealt mainly with Chagall's recollections of Jewish life in his shtetl, Vitebsk.

It has become fashionable in some circles to cast aspersions on Chagall's work, perhaps because of its popularity. I am certainly no art critic, but I found the collection singularly moving and deeply authentic. Though Chagall himself moved far away from the traditions of East European Jewish life, there is no denying his rootedness in that world and his appreciation of it.

The second exhibition was entitled Too Jewish?: Challenging Traditional Identities. It was a multi-media exhibition designed to present the varieties of artistic Jewish expression in the United States. It included paintings, sculptures, videos and short clips of TV sitcoms featuring Jewish themes or stars.

The exhibition attempts to establish the Jewish legitimacy of various forms of contemporary Jewish expression or lifestyles, even if they deviate from traditional identities. The range of themes included a focus on the Jewish body, especially noses; contemporary stereotypes of Jews, notably the Jewish American Princess (JAP); Jewishness in everyday life, including of course, food; Jewish forms of self-hatred and inauthenticity, such as name changes; and challenges based on feminism and sexual orientation.

This kind of Jewishness is in many ways typically "New York." The exhibition is far more about the ways non-Jews perceive Jews and the ways Jews perceive themselves than about timeless Jewish truths or values. Its objective is to expand notions of Jewish identity and community.

My favorite paintings included Neil Goldberg's Shecky, which featured photos of six Borscht Belt comedians affixed to six large matzahs; Deborah Kass' Four Barbras, part of her Jewish Jackie Series, which featured four profiles of Barbra Streisand; a large untitled canvas by Adam Rolston of a box of Manischewitz American matzahs (if it's OK for Andy Warhol to paint a can of Campbell soup ...); and a photo montage featuring former Dodger great Sandy Koufax.

One of the videos was Coping with Clothing by Barbara Nuddle. In this short film, Nuddle links her passion for shopping — a JAP stereotype — with her grief at the sudden tragic death of both her parents in a hotel fire.

In another video, Tomboychik, Sandi DuBowski, clearly wrestling with his own sexual identity, explores issues of sexuality and gender stereotypes in a moving dialogue with his grandmother.

The exhibition is thoroughly enjoyable, particularly for those with a fondness for Jewish popular culture and art dealing with Jewish themes. On the one hand, the subjects depicted in the exhibition are clearly Jewish, and in some cases might be deemed too Jewish to be exhibited in more mainstream artistic shows.

On the other hand, some might question: "Where's the brisket?" One wonders whether these works reflect a sufficiently Judaic content to withstand the ongoing seductions of the North American environment. While the sampling is terribly unscientific, I noticed only one visitor wearing a kippah. The Jewishness on display is in many ways symbolic.

It is ironic that Chagall prints have themselves become part of the symbolic repertoire of North American Jewish culture. In other words, they can be found in Jewish homes along with Sabbath candlesticks, Manischewitz matzah, Barbra Streisand music or a tape of Jackie Mason's one-man shows. In this sense — for better and for worse — the exhibitions are two sides of the same coin.

Smash the computers

By Rabbi Jonathan Plant

It has become common wisdom that much of our economic dislocation is due to an ever-increasing level of technological innovation. Computers are everywhere; e-mail is replacing snail mail (handled by the post office); the Internet lets you talk to strangers, which in turn makes you forget your neighbors (and sometimes your family); computers displace secretaries; voice mail improves the business budget and computer experts replace personnel managers. Jewish tradition says, "The more flesh, the more worms;" a modern parallel might be, "The more technology, the more dislocation."

So it is not surprising that last year on a much-publicized occasion, author Kirkpatrick Sale took a sledgehammer to hand and smashed his (or maybe somebody else's) computer. In doing so, he said something to the effect that in the past he used to own the instruments of his work, now they own him, and the computer served as the chief example.

There is no question that except for those who are employed in the electronics industry, a lot of us are profoundly disconcerted about developments that we cannot control. People working in offices used to look at other people (and sometimes even talk to them); now they are looking intently at their little screen, developing backaches and other ailments with fancy new terms. While the electronics industry is burgeoning, part of the unemployment problem stems from technological changes.

So, was Sale right when he smashed the computer in a public demonstration of what we all should do?

It comes as a surprise to some that the Sale syndrome is not new at all, for the anxiety over technological developments is by this time nearly 200 years old. At the beginning of the 19th century, when the new textiles machinery began to displace workers in England, groups of laborers organized themselves, and masked men began to smash textile machinery in various parts of the country. They were said to have a leader by the name of Ned Ludd (who was never seen by anyone), and enemies of machinery therefore came to be called Luddites.

At first, there was much public support for the Luddites' revolutionary activities, but when the government started instituting severe counter-measures — with shootings and hangings — the Luddites began fading from view and disappeared altogether when prosperity returned to England.

Again today, many of us are deeply worried about the impact of computer technology and all it means, rivaling or even surpassing the industrial revolution of 200 years ago. Neither then nor now will technology solve all our problems. We are going through a profound change in the way we conduct our relationships, our businesses, our teaching and our self-understanding. In all these changes it is important to remember that there are human needs that have to be met. The Torah's basic command is to love our neighbor and not things, however attractive or serviceable they may be.

The Kirshner File

The life and times of Ilya Ehrenburg

Ilya Ehrenburg was, simply, one of the most intriguing and controversial figures in the history of the Soviet Union. A novelist, poet, journalist and unofficial government spokesperson, Ehrenburg loomed large in the cultural and political spheres of his country.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Since his death in 1967, his memory has faded and, perhaps, been forgotten. But with the publication of Joshua Rubenstein's excellent biography, Tangled Loyalties, (HarperCollins, $49), the man and his life are resurrected for all to judge.

Rubenstein, a fellow at Harvard's Russian Research Centre, has done his homework. He immersed himself in, and mastered, the voluminous material. He interviewed a wide range of personalities who knew Ehrenburg on a firsthand basis.

A Jew born in Kiev in 1891 to secular middle-class parents, Ehrenburg was a paradox: a Communist who cared deeply about the Jewish people and a conformist-cum-careerist capable of tilting at windmills.

Ehrenburg, a political creature to the core, joined the Bolsheviks when he was 15, befriending Nikolai Bukharin, one of the future leaders of the 1917 revolution. Then, abandoning himself to art and poetry, Ehrenburg left the hurly-burly of politics. Facing a vacuum, he briefly toyed with the idea of converting to Catholicism and joining a monastery

The next few years were decisive. Ehrenburg endured the hunger, disease and violence of the Russian civil war; he published several collections of verse, including a poem entitled To the Jewish People; he denounced the Bolsheviks' intolerance of literary and political expression; he flirted with the Whites (the pro-Czarist forces), turning against them when he realized that pogromists were deeply embedded in their ranks; he went to Berlin, then Paris, writing a succession of novels and falling into journalism.

During this period, he produced his only Jewish novel, The Stormy Life of Lasik Roitschwantz, which revolved around a Jew who rejects tradition, tries in vain to blend into bourgeois Paris and finally settles in Palestine.

Interestingly enough, the sole Jew in the ruling Politburo, Lazar Kagonovich, disapproved of the book, and it did not appear in the Soviet Union until 1989.

As Rubenstein tells it, Ehrenburg did not reconcile himself to the Soviet state until the early 1930s, when Josef Stalin was consolidating his authority. The shift occured as Ehrenburg assumed the post of Paris correspondent of Izvestia . From this point onward, he was an "official" Soviet journalist.

Rubenstein speculates, not implausibly, that the rise of Nazism in Germany compelled him to choose sides. No longer could he remain an uncommitted, ironic skeptic.

Ehrenburg's career at Izvestia blossomed, thanks in no small part to the patronage of the editor, his old friend Bukharin. Travelling through Europe, Ehrenburg charted the rise of fascism and, through his network of friendships with European intellectuals, artists and politicians, did whatever he could to enhance the prestige of the Soviet Union. Indeed, Ehrenburg became part of Stalin's apparatus in the West.

Back home in Moscow, Ehrenburg challenged, albeit guardedly, the increasingly rigid conventions of Soviet literature and promoted the right of writers to individual expression. Although Ehrenburg had no illusions about the totalitarian nature of the Soviet Union, the military threat posed by a resurgent Germany overrode whatever objections he had to Stalin's repressive domestic policies, including the 1936 show trial which doomed Bukharin.

In the same year, the civil war in Spain broke out, and Ehrenburg channelled much of his protean energy to cover that conflict from the perspective of the Soviet-supported republican cause.

As the war drew to a close in 1939, he continued to rail against Germany with respect to its policy in Spain and in Central Europe. But when the Soviet Union entered into secret negotiations with Germany in the spring of that seminal year, Izvestia stopped publishing Ehrenburg's anti-German polemics.

Stalin's sensational non-aggression pact with Hitler stunned and disheartened Ehrenburg. For eight months, he was terribly ill, unable to swallow solid food, and for a while he considered leaving for Palestine.

Ehrenburg's fortunes rose with Germany's invasion of France and with the publication of one of his finest novels, The Fall of Paris, which solidified his reputation as the country's leading anti-fascist writer.

According to Rubenstein, Ehrenburg's stock rose to even greater heights in 1941, when Germany invaded the Soviet Union and he began writing about the war for Pravda and Krasnaya Zvezda. During these heady years, he was the most widely read and most influential journalist in the Soviet Union. Among his faithful readers was none other than Stalin himself.

To Ehrenburg's bitter disappointment, he learned that Jewish soldiers on the front were the butt of crude anti-Semitism. He worked hard to counteract anti-Semitic prejudice, describing the heroic exploits of Jews in the Soviet armed forces. After 1943, when the tide turned against Germany, his articles, particularly those about Jewish martyrdom, were heavily censored.

As the war progressed, Ehrenburg, in collaboration with the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, threw himself into an ambitious project aimed at recording the Holocaust in the Soviet Union. The volume in question, The Black Book, reached the proof stage but was never published, a victim of shifting Soviet propaganda.

The worst period of Ehrenburg's life, however, was yet to come. From 1945 until 1953, the darkest epoch of Soviet Jewry, Ehrenburg publicly thrived but privately was torn by anguish.

As Jewish writers and artists were cast into purgatory, and as the infamous Doctors' plot unfolded, Ehrenburg was awarded the then coveted Stalin Prize (his second) and selected as a deputy of the Soviet Congress of Nationalities.

But even Ehrenburg, the ultimate survivor, was not immune from developments. In 1949, as Stalin's paranoia about Jews grew, his articles stopped appearing. Soon enough, after writing a glowing tribute to Stalin on the occasion of his 70th birthday, he was back in favor. Sensing this, he declined to sign an official petition cravenly asking Stalin to send Jews into exile in Siberia and Birobidjan.

As for Ehrenburg's attitude to Israel, it was ambivalent. He proclaimed his belief in the right of Jews to have a state of their own, but insisted that the solution to the "Jewish problem" depended on "the triumph of Socialism over capitalism ..."

After Stalin's death and Nikita Khrushchev's accession to power, Ehrenburg continued to probe the limits of Soviet censorship and constraints on art, literature and historical truth. But Ehrenberg was anything but a rebel. In 1966, he refused to endorse an appeal on behalf of two famous Soviet dissidents, Andrei Sinyavsky and Yuly Daniel. On the other hand, he refused to sign a petition condemning Israel during the Six Day War.

Clearly, Ehrenburg was a complex person, a multi-layered figure whom Rubenstein brilliantly fleshes out in this stellar biography.

Anti-Semitism becomes a personal issue

By KATHY POLYCHRONOPOULOS
Special to The CJN

Guest Voices

In October 1995, I wrote an article that was published in the Toronto Star about my family's experience with anti-Semitism as people of Jewish heritage in the Canadian educational system.

The article was provoked by a radio broadcast in Toronto by a local personality who claimed Legal Aid's financial crisis should be attributed to Jewish mothers. He hypothesized that Jewish mothers push their children to go to law school and that these same children, when grown, are so greedy that they have drained the Legal Aid Plan of its funds.

The day my article appeared in the newspaper, two anonymous people phoned me at my home and threatened me with physical harm.

One of the men said Adolph Hitler made a mistake when he didn't kill my grandfather during the war and that I could be next.

I hung up the telephone, stunned and shaking.

The thought that my seemingly small voice could have provoked such a violent response was overwhelming and frightening. For a brief moment, I felt responsible, almost guilty.

When I recovered my senses and calmed down, I sadly contemplated that my real problem was not the immediate one of short-term safety but of my future as a journalist writing about Jewish issues.

I realized that if I wanted to live a safe and threat-free life, I might have to abandon the idea of writing "Jewish" articles.

That, in and of itself, was a profoundly sad moment for me, because it would be an abandonment of principles I think are central to me as a person and an abdication of my integrity.

This process has made me think a lot about the very reason I wrote the article about anti-Semitism.

When I'd written about anti-Semitism affecting my family, I had chronicled post-war events that had a direct impact on my father and prevented him from being educated at a Canadian university in Manitoba, 40 years ago.

Anti-Semitism has been one of my "causes" and I've always considered myself a faithful inductee, always proud to tow the official "Jewish" line.

But until that afternoon when I received the telephone threats, it was an issue that had not affected my daily life, that had not affected where I went to school, where I went to work or who I associated with in my community.

Until I felt the fright of not knowing who was threatening me, until I learned what it is like to jump every time the doorbell rings unexpectedly or the postman shoves my mail through the slot in the front door loudly, anti-Semitism didn't exist in my personal life.

The study of anti-Semitism has been easy for me. It's widely written about, reported on and broadcast in the media.

Morbidly, I think, it has become a fashionable cinematic topic. Nazi's are popular, commercially successful.

I've watched and read my share of movies and books analyzing anti-Semitism, but the movie that has had the most significant and poignant impact on me is Schindler's List.

The segment of the movie that remains the most disturbing and vivid in my mind is the deportation scene of the child inmates at a labor camp in Plaszow, Poland.

Untersturmfuhrer Amon Goeth attempts to clear the camp of all the children. He orders their immediate deportation to the crematoria of Auschwitz. The children are lured, under false pretenses, to large trucks which will transport them.

In the midst of the justifiable hysteria that explodes at Plaszow when the parents of these children see them being driven away, a few of the captured children manage to escape and are able to hide in the labor camp instead of being taken to Auschwitz.

Those who do manage to hide live in squalid, degrading, hopelessly cramped conditions. Some live under the floorboards of the barracks, some hide in furnace rooms and closets and others conceal themselves in the latrines.

One 11-year-old girl, Danka Dresner, chooses to hide in the toilets of one of the camp's outhouses.

She hides there in the movie, chest high in gallons of liquid excrement. Her round spectacles, neatly-tied braids, silk hair ribbons, cherubic face and yellow Star of David on the breast pocket of her simple, navy dress are blemished with human feces. She stands there catatonically, immobilized with fear and resigned to her fate of degrading filth.

It is that disturbing view of anti-Semitism in Jewish history that I think of now in relation to my own experiences.

It has been 50 years since World War II. Dresner is living peacefully in her retirement years in Israel, a mother and a grandmother, having been liberated from Plaszow by the Allied Forces at the end of the war.

Plaszow Labor Camp and Auschwitz and other centres of human destruction are no longer operational and, as in the case of Auschwitz, stand silently, supposedly a grim reminder to the world of the evils of hate, intolerance and anti-Semitism.

And yet, these issues continue to flourish and thrive in a global climate that tolerates them and sits in servile passivity as immigrants and identifiable religious groups are victimized. The dangers of anti-Semitism are given lip-service, I think, but are not genuinely tackled by the non-Jewish world.

My personal brush with anti-Semitism has been frightening, but it has been illuminating.

It has awakened in me a sense that being a journalist is not merely about writing and reporting. I realize now it is also about having the fortitude to stand up for values and for your community, regardless of the possible personal danger involved.

I've also realized that being silent about anti-Semitism may be safe for me in the short term, but dangerous to my community in the long term.

And as long as I have a picture in my conscience of a little Jewish girl whose fight for life rather than death meant hiding in a toilet, I know anti-Semitism is an issue I have a personal obligation to confront in my writing.

Religionist's stand proves puzzling

Books

Has Tom Harpur fallen into the hands of the anti-Semites? That would be both surprising and unfortunate, because I have always regarded him as a liberal religionist, fair minded and level headed. As an Anglican priest, professor of New Testament at the University of Toronto, television personality and author, he has always expressed friendliness to Judaism and the need for ecumenical understanding.

In his recent book, Would you believe? he writes, "The authors of the Torah — the first five Books of Moses — believed they found and came to know God through the Law. The great prophets of Israel saw and knew him in ethical principles and above all, deeds of justice and mercy, especially towards the poor and the oppressed. So, too, can we find God in the promptings of our conscience and in our awareness of a moral

There's more than one way to get the byte on Shavuot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Shavuot is certainly one of the most important holidays in the Jewish calendar. But the springtime festival that celebrates the giving of the Torah and the harvesting of the first fruits clearly doesn't receive the attention bestowed on Passover or even Chanukah.

But for people who want to know more about Shavuot, the information is waiting for you on the Jewish Highway. Israel Rosencrantz of Morristown, N.J., has written a comprehensive guide to the holiday and its customs. [http://www.planet.net/peterr/shavuot.html] Edward Walker of Belmont, Mass., takes a look at why Shavuot deserves our attention and how the festival is observed in the Reform movement. [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/ma/ma002/shavuot.html]

Shavuot is not without controversy. In Tradition or Compassion [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/950601_Shav_Brody.html], Calgary's Eliezer Segal tells a fascinating story of a 19th century dispute. It centred on whether the observance of the second day of Shavuot could be temporarily suspended because of the hardship it would cause an individual. That incident and its resolution would still provoke debate today.

For a more personal look at the holiday, Rabbi Mendel Weinbach describes his feelings on a special Shavuot 29 years ago in A Return to Jerusalem. [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/shavuos/shav96.htm] After the Six Day War, the Old City was closed off because of danger from snipers and land mines.

Rabbi Weinbach tells how it felt on that special Shavuot in 1967 to finally be allowed to return to the Kotel.

On Shavuot, the Book of Ruth is read. For several of the reasons why we honor the memory of the Moabite convert to Judaism on this holiday see [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/shavuos/shav95.htm]. If you have installed Hebrew fonts on your Internet browser, you can read Ruth in the original Hebrew at [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mrut-.html]. The King James English translation of Ruth can be found at [http://www.spd.louisville.edu/~m0zaud01/holy/rth.txt].

Of course, no discussion of any Jewish holiday would be complete without food. Shavuot is unique in the calendar because of the tradition of eating dairy products ... and that usually means blintzes. For those watching their waistline, there's Elaine's Bubbe's Low-Fat Blintz. [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/blinela2.htm]

Would you believe a New Mexico Blintz [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/blinnewm.htm] with chili peppers and paprika? And Goldie's Blintz Recipe [http://www.users.interport.net/~gog/recp.html] even includes an illustration on how to fold a blintz properly.

But why stop with ordinary blintzes when you can celebrate with something called a Blintz Loaf? [http://www.op.net/docs/Recipes/jewish/blintzloaf]

Finally, if you'd like some food for thought as you get out all that cheese, eggs and butter, take a look at The Yo-Yo Diet Guide to the Jewish Holidays. [http://www.extremely.com/yoyodiet.html].

David M. Bader postulates that the Jewish holidays are divided between days on which we must starve and days we must eat. For example: Hanukkah – Eat potato pancakes; Tenth of Tevet – Do not eat potato pancakes; Tu b'Shevat – Feast; Fast of Esther – Fast; Purim – Eat pastry; Passover – Do not eat pastry; Shavuot – Feast on dairy foods (cheesecake, blintzes); Seventeenth of Tammuz – Fast (definitely no cheesecake or blintzes).

Far be it from me to contradict an undeniable scholar of Bader's stature. Pass the blintz loaf please.

Religionist has been naive

law within us. We can find him in acts of compassion and generosity towards all."

In a recent Toronto Star column, however, entitled, Religions must Root out Bigoted Teachings, he seems to have gone astray. Referring to a work entitled Jewish Religion by Israel Shahak, he repeats some ancient canards and falsehoods about Judaism.

Shahak's book has a cover blurb by Noam Chomsky and a forward by Gore Vidal. Surely that should have warned Harpur about the book, for both of them are passionate antagonists of the State of Israel. Recently, Chomsky wrote an introduction to a book by Robert Faurisson which denies the reality of the Holocaust.

Of course, there are zealots and extremists in Judaism, as there are in all major faiths. But, how numerous are they and how faithful to the Jewish tradition? Harpur quotes Shahak, who says that fundamentalist Judaism is "imbued with a deep hatred toward Christianity, complete with many Talmudic texts filled with malicious slander against Jesus."

It should be emphasized that it was the Talmudic sage Rabbi Akiva who asserted that the most important principle in the Torah is "Love your neighbor as yourself." And this law was meant not only for Jews because it is indicated quite clearly in Verse 34 of the same chapter, Leviticus 19, that similar love had to be shown to the foreigner who resided in the land.

In the 12th century, Maimonides taught that a Jew should perform all acts of charity for non-Jews even as for Jews — to visit the sick, to bury the dead, to support the needy — for Scripture teaches: "The Lord is good to all; His tender mercies are over all His Creation."

The 16th century codification of Jewish law in the Shulchan Aruch states the duty of a Jew to give to non-Jewish charity, to deal honestly, the same law applying to Jew and non-Jew alike.

These views are basic elements of the Jewish tradition. They represent the expressions of the foremost authorities in the Talmud and the standard code of Jewish practice. Their messages blend as one, telling of the common denominator which unites Christian and Jew.

The accusation that the Talmud contains texts filled with malicious slander against Jesus is an old and familiar anti-Semitic piece of hatred. It has been demolished over and over again. In the 19th century, for instance, the German Christian scholar, Prof. Hermann L. Strack characterized such teachings as a combination of ignorance, blind hatred and malevolence.

Harpur concludes his column with the admonition, "It's high time all Jews became aware of this dark side of their religious tradition and begin to confront it with courage and repentance."

What colossal chutzpah, with the agony of the Holocaust still fresh in our hearts and minds and in the light of two millennia of unrelenting Christian hatred and oppression of Jews and Judaism. I hope that Harpur will acknowledge that he has been naive, misled by a one-sided and tendentious work by an apparently self-hating Jew whose calumnies are far removed from the high traditions and teachings of Judaism.

Jewish students lauded for achievements

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's recent Jewish Campus Awards night was a far cry from its showbiz counterparts glitz-wise, but probably deserves its own prize for warmth and spirit.

The event, held in the subterranean billiard/TV room of Milanos, a downtown restaurant and club, was a first for Toronto university and college students, over a dozen of whom received awards.

"Why are we bothering to go to all this trouble?" asked Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, the umbrella for Jewish student organizations at the University of Toronto, York University, Ryerson Polytechnic University and Seneca College.

"What we're trying to instil tonight is a sense of pride, that the community should really know that what we do is important. The work we do says that being Jewish is important and that being Jewish on campus is important."

Award recipients were recognized from within the campus community as well as by the greater Jewish community. Six sponsors, either organizations or individuals, presented the following recipients with a plaque and Artscroll Stone edition Chumash:

• Jordan Gottlieb, outgoing president of Seneca Hillel, received the Schwartz Levitsky Feldman Chai award for special involvement in Jewish campus life.

• Sidura Ludwig of York University received the Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture. Ludwig spearheaded the creation of Dorot, a new Jewish literary magazine.

• Jessica Pelt of U of T, co-editor of the Jewish student quarterly Images, won the Canadian Jewish News Award for Jewish Campus Communications.

• Teri Rothenberg of York University was presented with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee for Jewish Continuity Award. As a vice-president at the Jewish Student Federation (JSF), Rothenberg was involved in the creation of a number of Jewish identity programs.

• Naomi Rifkind of U of T received the UJA/Federation Award for Chesed and Social Justice for her work on Out of the Cold, a program for homeless people. Rifkind organized weekly contingents of student volunteers to help out with the program.

•Marc Altshuller, who heads a Toronto Jewish fraternity, received the Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership.

Among the students receiving awards from their respective organizations were Natalie Margitta of the JSF at York, Leor Rotchild of Seneca Hillel, Derek Sherman and Ari Shapiro of Ryerson Hillel, and Jon Friedman of the Jewish Student Union-Hillel at U of T.

Two scholarships were presented to U of T students for involvement in the campus and general Jewish community: Noah Markus received the Max Rosen scholarship and David Moskovitch, the Emil Fackenheim scholarship. Both students will be studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem next year.

Honorary mention was given to 19 other students, among them Natasha Greenberg, who recently received one of U of T's most prestigious scholarships awarded to graduating students, and Dena Libman of York University who will soon be working at Hillel International in Washington, D.C., on a Hillel fellowship. (see article below)

Grad pursues career at U.S. Hillel office

TORONTO — Some university students find their career niche in the lecture hall, when a particular subject or professor has a strong impact on them. Others, like Dena Libman, a graduating history major, find that their extracurricular activities lead them in unanticipated career directions.

Dena Libman

Libman, a 22-year-old United Synagogue Youth adviser and former president of the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) at York University, is about to have a one-year taste of life as a Jewish campus professional in the Washington, D.C. office of Hillel International.

She is the first Canadian to receive Hillel's Arline and David L. Bittker Fellowship, established in the late 1980s. The one-year fellowship funds a recent college graduate interested in pursuing a career in the organized Jewish community.

A graduate of United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) and Forest Hill Collegiate Institute, Libman became involved with the JSF during her second year at York.

She attributes her strong Jewish identity and commitment to her parents, Judy and Mark, who are active in a number of Jewish organizations. "USDS played a big part, but the education I was getting was reinforced at home. My family is very committed Jewishly."

Last summer Libman was one of 11 Toronto students to attend Hillel International's annual Leaders' Assembly in Pennsylvania.

"I came back so excited and geared up for the year," she recalled in a recent interview, her enthusiasm still fresh-sounding nine months after her return. "You come out of it with so much energy and so many program ideas." This year, as the Bittker fellow, she will help plan the seminar.

"Hillel has two tracks," Libman explained. "The 'engagement' track tries to find students who are uncommitted Jewishly or who aren't interested, and then help them find the Jewish connection. The 'empowerment' track helps students who are identified Jewishly, and who are showing leadership potential become better leaders. I'll be working with the empowerment track."

Among her other duties will be helping to plan Jewish Awareness Month, held on over 100 campuses across North America. — F.K.

גידי קורן

עור מעם בחירות:

הצצה חובה בניו יורק:

אם אתם שייכים לאלה שנוסעים לניו-יורק פעם באיזו שנה שנתיים כדי לטעום את טעמו של ה- Downtown של העולם, ואם אתם מאלה שמחפשים לראות הצגה טובה או שתיים, ואם ראיתם את כל מחזות הזמר המטופשים שיש ובא לכם משהו באמת רציני, אז תמשיכו לקרוא: Molly Sweeney הוא מחזה אירי שנכתב על ידי בריאן פריאל והובא ישר מדבלין לאחר שזכה להצלחה בכל העולם. זהו סיפורה של אישה בת 41 שהתעוורה בגיל שנה, שעוברת ניתוח עיניים שמחזיר לה את הראייה. מה שקורה לה מאותו רגע והלאה מנוגד להגיון המיידי: כולנו היינו מניחים שמולי תתפוך לאישה מאושרת, שייפתח לפניה עולם חדש. טעות גסה! למולי היה עולם מושלם ומאוזן לפני כן, כולל עבודה טובה וחברים וחברות ובעל אוהב. הניתוח הרס את עולמה והביא אותה להיסגר במקום להיפתח, לאבד את כל מה שהיה לה. יש בהצגה קטע מדהים שבו לומדת מולי לראות. מציגים בפניה פרח, שהיא ידעה מה צבעיו ואיך הוא נראה מתיאורים רבים, אך היא אינה מזהה אותו. ואז היא לוקחת אותו בידיים, עוצמת עיניים וממששת אותו ומזהה אותו בקלות! ההצגה הזו פותחת צוהר לתיאטרון אירי מעולה. איזו פשטות, איזו חוכמה! שלושה שחקנים בלבד, בלי דאווינים, בלי כל הקרקס הטפשי של ברודווי. טיפ קטן להצגות בניו יורק: אם אתם רואים שהצגה דרמתית הגיעה לברודווי מאין שהוא אחר, - אין אפס! סימן שהיא הצליחה בגדול לְהַגָּשׁ קהל רחב לפני שהחליטו לקחת עליה סיכון בניו יורק. אז תרוצו! אבל שישאר בינינו.

פֶלאפון כמו מלפפון:

חידה: מה אחוז האנשים בצפון אמריקה שיש להם פֶלאפון (Cellular phone) ? בסביבות שני אחוזים. נו, ומה אחוז האנשים בישראל שיש להם פֶלאפון? ניחשתם, - מתקרב לארבעים אחוז! לאחרונה יצאה בארץ תכנית חדשה, כדי להגדיל את האחוזים עוד יותר: הורים מסדרים לילד פֶלאפון שאפשר לחייג בו רק מספר אחד. למיז ניחשתם, לאמא! באחד מהגיוסים האחרונים לצה"ל היו לכל הילדים מינוס שניים פֶלאפונים. הגיעו הדברים לידי כך שצה"ל אוסר על שימוש בפֶלאפונים בשטח הבסיס. זוכרים את הימים שלא יכולנו לדבר עם הבית חודש? קרה לנו משהוא עכשיו ברצינות: זהו עוד סימן לעליונות המסתמנת של ישראל בטכנולוגיה, בקומוניקציה, בלהיות ראשון. נכון שרוב אלה שיש להם פלפון לא ממש צריכים אותו, אבל מה - זהו שוק אנרסיבי, ובשוק אנרסיבי, ולא משנה באיזה ענף - החשוב ביותר זה להיות בעניינים. חוץ מזה שבירושלים (אפס שתיים) חיוג לעולם של מעלה זו שיחה מקומית ואז הפלאפון מאוד משתלם. - אבל שישאר בינינו.

Toronto wins big in Bible Contest

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish students from across the country recently gathered in the Toronto area to compete in the national Bible contest of the World Zionist Organization (WZO).

The 1996 national contest, held at Netivot Hatorah Day School and Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation drew 149 students from seven Canadian cities — Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Montreal, London and Toronto.

The contestants, students from grades 5 to 13, had to score at least 85 percent in the regional written exams in February to qualify for the national contest. The marathon event spanned a day and a half and culminated with an awards and closing banquet on the second evening.

The students competed in one of four groups: an English division for supplementary school students in grades 5 and 6, and three Hebrew divisions for day school students in grades 5 and 6, 7 and 8, and 9 to 13.

The stakes were high, because besides wanting to win, competitors are aware that the winners of the 7 and 8 and 9 to 13 divisions are awarded trips to Israel to compete in the worldwide Bible contest.

"There is such a passion about this event; it gets to be the most important thing," said contest organizer Yael Seliger, director of teacher development and personnel practices at the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) in Toronto.

Students from out of town were billeted with families of day school students in the Toronto area, she explained. She also praised the people at Netivot Hatorah for their assistance.

Joseph Steiner, president of the BJE, said, "The Bible contest is one more opportunity to do things as a community rather than as individual schools."

The contest, a combination of oral and written questions, progressed to the semi-final and final rounds, with students eliminated gradually until there was a single winner of each division.

All the students who came first this year were from the Toronto area.

The contest is co-sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Board of Jewish Education of Toronto, the Education Council of Montreal and the Jewish National Fund.

And the winners are...

TORONTO — In the 1996 National Bible Contest finals of the World Zionist Organization, winners of the day school division:

Grades 5-6: Batya Breslow, Eitz Chaim — Spring Farm — Toronto; Nurielle Stern, United Synagogue Day School — Toronto; Eliav Danziger, Netivot Hatorah — Toronto.

Grades 7-8: Jonathan Mandelbaum, United Synagogue Day School — Toronto; Melissa Gitman, Herzliah — Snowden — Montreal; Carolyn Gehr, Herzliah — Snowden — Montreal.

Chatan Israel: Aviad Tapuchi, Eitz Chaim — Patricia.

Grades 9-13: Dalia Rotstein, Independent — Toronto; Elisheva Zoltov, Independent — Toronto; Ziporah Kapustin, Ulpanat Orot — Toronto.

Kallah Israel: Noa Englman, Ulpanat Orat — Toronto.

Winners of the afternoon school division:

Grades 5-7 — Ben Strauss, Downtown Jewish Community School — Toronto; Karen Neiderhoffer, Congregation Emanu-El — Victoria, B.C.; Shiri Trop, Beth Tikvah — Toronto.

Potential converts said to feel 'connected' to Judaism, Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Those who convert for the sake of marrying a Jew, actually are looking for a Jew to marry so that they can convert, insists Patricia Rucker.

Rucker should know. While she converted before marrying her husband, Leon, she said that in fact she had been interested in Jews and Judaism since her childhood.

She was speaking at the first of a series of programs on conversion called Your God is My God, sponsored by Adath Israel Congregation adult study committee.

It all begins, she said, with a feeling of connectedness with Jews, perhaps neighbors, friends, classmates, "a sense of interest and curiosity about the Jewish people and the Jewish experience."

She remembers being "comfortable and happy" with her Jewish friends, and realizing with a sense of horror that the events of the Diary of Anne Frank "could have happened to my friend Julie or Shelly."

She said that she sensed even then "the strength of the Jewish community and the Jewish family, and an admiration for a people who could build [such a family and community structure] in exile."

While conversion is supposed to be a completely disinterested decision; she noted that in the Chumash, the impetus for conversion was another person - Naomi for Ruth, Moses for Jethro.

Along with intellectual learning, potential converts should be mentored, she suggested, "by people who understand what we are going through."

Holocaust survivors

There are so many things you don't know that you are always terrified of putting your foot wrong, she said, such as Yiddish expressions, the practical aspects of shopping for Pesach, Jewish humor.

"Minor things take on a major significance," she said.

A whole other problem in conversions is the issue of the Holocaust and Holocaust survivors.

The only response is to "learn about it, accept it, and realize that through our conversion we are making our stand. We are saying that we are putting ourselves beside you: like Ruth, we are saying 'where thous diest, I will die, and there will I be buried.' "

She questioned the attitude that when one converts, "a relationship with the previous life no longer exists."

"We are Jews, but with a difference," she said. "Our memories include Christmas, Easter eggs, funerals and weddings in churches. We can't just throw it away — we can't turn our back on the people who gave birth to you and raised you."

There will always be a tug, she said. "We can't forget where we came from, nor should we, no matter how happy we are."

Brando not anti-Semitic, King tells BB lodge

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Actor Marlon Brando is not anti-Semitic, according to radio and television personality Larry King.

King, host of CNN's Larry King Live, was the keynote speaker at a recent gala dinner for 400 at Beth Tzedec Synagogue to celebrate the 50th anniversary of B'nai Brith's Upper Canada Lodge No. 1615, which was founded by the late Phil Givens.

During an interview on King's talk show last month, Brando made derogatory remarks indicating that Jews control the film industry.

But King insisted that Brando's remarks were quoted out of context. After clearing the air about Brando — he said many people have been asking him about the actor's remarks — King entertained the audience with anecdotes about speech-making and growing up Jewish in Brooklyn.

Despite his celebrity status, King said he still maintains close ties with his boyhood pals. When he's in Washington he has lunch with his best friend, Herbie Cohen, he said. "We've been friends for 51 years."

King, who is noted for his celebrity interviews, which have included U.S. President Bill Clinton, Margaret Thatcher, Mikhail Gorbachev and O. J. Simpson, still marvels at his fame. "I can't believe all that has happened to me," he said.

Among those who attended the celebration were Liberal MPs Jim Peterson and Barry Campbell, Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick, Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter and Metro Councillor Norm Gardner.

"Your lodge is not the oldest," said Campbell, who had a long association with B'nai Brith in his youth. "But there are none [no other B'nai Brith lodges] that are better known, that have done more trail-blazing."

'High risk behavior' said cause of AIDS in women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Women in North America are not yet considered a high risk for being infected by the AIDS virus, and as a result are not protected as well as they could be, contends Louise Binder, a woman living with AIDS.

"There is no high risk group of people. There is only high risk behavior and that means one of three things — unprotected sex, blood to blood or mother to child," Binder said at a recent panel discussion sponsored by Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am and Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committees. Panel members, Binder and Susan (who wishes to remain unnamed) represented Voices of Positive Women, a community-based non-profit organization directed by and for women living with HIV and AIDS. Moderator was Dr. Donna Keystone, an HIV primary care physician.

Keystone said that although the panel was called Women and AIDS: A Different Story, it is really a mainstream story.

"In 1985, six Ontario women tested HIV positive. In 1994, 1,500 tested positive and that is just those we know about. There is no profile for those living with AIDS."

Binder, 46, a retired lawyer, is chair of Voices of Positive Women and sits on the board of Toronto People with AIDS Foundation, which offers practical support such as emergency financial and housing assistance to people living with AIDS. She also sits on the board of the HIV AIDS Legal Clinic of Ontario. She was infected by her husband, from whom she was later separated and who has since died from AIDS and she blames doctors for not recognizing AIDS as a disease for which women are at risk.

"They do not test early enough and that could make a significant difference in terms of quality of life and longevity for those infected with the virus," she said.

Although medical symptoms may be similar for men and women, Binder said, that is as far as the similarities go. Poverty, child care, good health care, reproduction, safer sex, confidentiality and the role of the woman as the main caregiver all weigh heavily on a woman who discovers she is carrying the AIDS virus.

"Historically, women are lowest on the socio-economic scale, and living with AIDS requires tremendous output. Those infected need to eat well and take expensive vitamin and mineral supplements," Binder said. "Stress reduction is also important but not many women can afford the massages, acupuncture or yoga classes that could help reduce stress. There are significant costs just to keep in a healthy state."

As the caregivers, women often put their own needs last, she said, especially if there is another infected family member. "A woman might not be able to afford things for herself and give to her family as well, and that causes added stress.

Susan, who also contracted AIDS through heterosexual sex, has since married a man living with AIDS. She founded a support group for HIV positive mothers after her own son, now 3½, tested HIV positive. She said major issues for her revolve around who to tell, how much to tell and when to tell.

"Do you tell babysitters or a child's friends. You don't want their whole life to be AIDS. These are very hard decisions to make. If only everyone would tell someone else that we are average women, that would help the cause."

Baycrest run goes to dogs, as well as owners

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A total of 1,400 runners and walkers took part in Baycrest Centre's 16th annual run on Mother's Day, despite the cool weather.

Joining the 5-kilometre walkers were 38 dogs and their owners. Some of the dogs later took part in a dog fashion show.

Among the participants in the run were North York Mayor Mel Lastman and Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall, the latter being the special guest of Mon Sheong, a Chinese charitable group whose members also took part.

The two mayors finished the 5-km walk, as did Baycrest executive vice-president Stephen Herbert, while Dave Johnson, chair of the Ontario cabinet's management committee, completed the 10-km run.

Conductive education program puts focus on disabled children

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Conductive education, a system which merges special education and physiotherapy for children with disabilities, will be the focus of an educational awareness program sponsored by Beth Tikvah Congregation social action committee and the Ontario March of Dimes.

The program will be held at Beth Tikvah, 3080 Bayview Ave., on May 26, from 8 to 10 p.m.

Conductive education was developed in Hungary by Dr. Andras Peto, a Jewish physician, shortly after the end of World War II. The Peto Institute in Budapest is still the heart of this program, not just in working with the disabled children, but also in producing the highly trained teachers, called conductors, necessary for the technique to be effective.

Physical disabilities are approached from an educational perspective. Dr. Maria Hari, the current director, describes it as "learning coordination — the same way as we learn math. If the brain can find a way to get to the moon, it can certainly find new ways for the body to work."

A holistic approach integrates physical, intellectual and social development, a media release from the March of Dimes says.

Working in small groups, and with a liberal use of music, chants, and especially encouragement, the children learn step by step to control their muscles.

Videos available at the March of Dimes office in Toronto show children who in the beginning have very little muscle control, but are later able to sit up, stand and even, in some cases, walk.

There are rewards for each accomplishment, no matter how small, and the parents are encouraged to allow the child to do things on their own.

Paige Soicher, 4, and her father Bernie work on conductive education techniques. [Photo courtesy of P.A.C.E.]

While there are institutes teaching the Peto method in Israel, Belgium, Holland, Australia, Hong Kong and England, there are none in the United States or Canada, although the Ontario March of Dimes runs Ability Camp, which uses the techniques.

For four hours per day, five days a week for five weeks, children, and their parents if the youngsters are under six or require parental assistance, learn these new skills from staff who are trained conductors. Participants may return for more advanced training.

An attempt is being made to heighten awareness of conductive education in Ontario by Positive Action for Conductive Education (PACE), a non-profit organization of parents and professionals.

March of Dimes executive director Andria Spindel and program director Jerry Lucas, both members of Beth Tikvah and very interested in conductive education, are taking part in the program at the synagogue.

Spindel's aunt, Betty Yan, found out about the Peto Institute on a visit to Hungary with her grandson, then nearly five, who has spina bifida, and who, she feels, could have benefited from the technique.

"It's very important to have a facility like that, where the families can be together and where they speak the same language," she said, noting that in Israel, Tsad Kadima, as the program is called there, is funded by the Ministry of Education.

For more information contact Judi Lytle at the Ontario March of Dimes, 425-3463, ext. 213.

Magazine angers mayors

TORONTO — Metro mayors are angry over a National Geographic article that quoted Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel's views on immigration and they plan to send the magazine a formal letter of protest.

"Zundel, I think, is extreme and doesn't represent balanced commentary," said Metro Chair Alan Tonks.

"This man is a blight on our community, an embarrassment," said East York Mayor Michael Prue.

Canadian Jewish Congress, in a letter to National Geographic, said "your choice to utilize Zundel gave him undeserved credibility and is a stain on you magazine's good name."

Zundel's comments appeared in an article in the June issue of the National Geographic magazine. He is identified as "one of the leading neo-Nazi propagandists in the world" and is quoted as objecting "to allowing hordes of racially unabsorbable populations to invade the living spaces of a specific race."

Zundel, a native of Germany, is currently challenging a finding by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service that he be deported as a security risk to Canada.

JSU's Greenberg receives Moss Scholarship

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The University of Toronto recently awarded a student who has been active in the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) with this year's John H. Moss Scholarship, given to exceptional third and fourth year students to assist with their continuing education.

Natasha Greenberg, 22, who graduated with a BA in Jewish Studies from Innis College, received a $12,000 scholarship which she will use to continue her education at Brandeis University, where she plans on pursuing a doctorate in Jewish Studies.

Having the award presented to her was a little out of the ordinary, Greenberg says, because it is usually given to someone involved in university issues as opposed to issues that comprise a component of the university.

"This scholarship was particularly rewarding to me, because it shows that the selection committee is aware that a component community, such as the Jewish Students' Union, which makes up the university's larger identity, is considered to make a contribution to the whole," Greenberg says.

Educated in secular schools and the Holy Blossom Hebrew and religious school, Greenberg says she was always involved in temple and youth groups, but the Jewish experience was not her entire focus.

"I was actually torn between studying anthropology and taking Jewish Studies and I finally chose Jewish Studies because I was uncomfortable with the idea of invading someone else's culture. I decided to study my own culture where I belong and feel part of the community."

Through her work as president of JSU, Greenberg was recognized for her efforts in facilitating inter-ethnic and inter-group relations.

"It is very important that different groups connect, and the campus is a unique place for this to happen because everyone is a member of a single institute as well as their individual group."

This year, she initiated a small gathering of Muslim and Jewish students and was pleased with its outcome. "I think we made some headway in bringing groups together," she says.

Greenberg concedes that it is difficult to get students involved in JSU because the University of Toronto is a commuter campus and many students maintain their childhood and adolescent connections with synagogue and friends.

"We've tried all the tactics in getting them involved and what we discovered is that it is important not to underestimate students. Their level of understanding issues and self-determination is high and we have to appeal at that level. We can never appeal to the entire community, but we can plan programs that reach all levels of observance, something that can bring everyone together."

A social action project that actually attracted too many volunteers was the JSU's involvement in Out of the Cold, a downtown soup kitchen partly sponsored by Holy Blossom. "We plugged into that project and students just kept on coming out. They saw it as a way to get involved in the Jewish community and the community at large."

While at Brandeis, Greenberg plans to study modern Jewish studies and inter-group relations and sees herself, one day, working in an organization that is at the forefront of these issues.

How to give forever.

The way I look at it, giving deserves just as much planning as any other financial activity. Because when I give, I want to know that my money will work as hard as possible and as long as possible to support the community. That's why my wife, Jillian Townsend, and I put a lot of thought into how we wanted to give to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

Our idea was to set up a charitable trust fund.

Working with the people at Mount Sinai, we designed the trust to support medical research. The beauty of a trust is that it keeps on giving: the capital will generate interest income for the hospital in perpetuity. And you don't need to be a Rockefeller to set one up. Even modest gifts over a period of time can create a fund with real giving power when pooled with the gifts of others — to fund a hospital that does some of the best medical research in the world.

We may not be able to live forever, but our gift can.

Mount Sinai Hospital has gift planners who can work with you to customize your gift. Please call (416) 586-8203 or fax (416) 586-8639 for a free copy of YOUR ESTATE RECORD and PLANNING GUIDE.

Anti-racism leaders fight 'assassins of memory'

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Holocaust deniers are "assassins of memory," said Helmut Loewen of Winnipeg, research director of the Western Anti-Racism Network (WARN).

Speaking at a meeting here to discuss community action against hate, Loewen said the new crop of Nazis "seek to destroy the history and memory of the Holocaust." He said Holocaust deniers claim that survivors tell exaggerated stories.

Canada is one of the world's largest purveyors of Holocaust denial material, he said.

Racist and Nazi groups work closely together across the country under various names, but anti-racists and anti-fascists are trying to fight this by careful research and by exposing them. "We must reactivate the anti-fascist spirit and movements that were so active in Winnipeg during the Hitler era," Loewen said.

David Lethbridge, head of the Salmon Arm B.C. Coalition Against Racism (SACAR), said Nazis have held "leadership conferences" in the Salmon Arm area, attracting high profile deniers.

There is almost no end to the amount of hate material they send out, Lethbridge added. Teachers as well as students are recruited. The Nazis are very successful and "the most important work we can do is to fight them vigorously."

Alan Dutton of Vancouver, director of the Canadian Anti-Racism and Research Society, which sponsored the meeting, called for "positive education" to fight the deniers. "We're monitoring the hate groups and plan to work closely with the provincial government's new anti-hate unit."

He warned of a growing presence of racists in Victoria and predicted "a hot summer" here in dealing with them.

The meeting was held at the Jewish Community Centre under auspices of the local lodge of B'nai B'rith.

In Kelowna, B.C., a hotbed of racism, Tammie Schnitzer spoke to the Okanagan Jewish community about efforts of her own community in nearby Billings, Mont., to deal with racists. Her community, she said, activated the cooperation of the media, the police, local politicians and unions. This will be an ongoing effort, she added. She showed a film, Not in Our Town, on anti-hate activities in Billings.

The chair of the Kelowna meeting was Robert Levin.

Youngsters join in hockey tourney

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — More than 50 Jewish youngsters from smaller communities in the Golden Horseshoe area gathered here recently for the second annual regional hockey tournament.

The youngsters came from St. Catherines, Niagara, Kitchener-Waterloo, Oakville and Mississauga as well as Toronto. They were welcomed by Hamilton JCC president, Larry Szpirglas, and each received a hockey shirt.

Dr. Leslie Berman, father of a 12-year-old son and an 8-year-old daughter, became convinced of the need to network with other small Jewish communities last year while organizing the first tournament and hearing youth leaders talk of how their groups were "languishing" for lack of contact with other Jewish groups.

He sees the tournament as a means of providing an opportunity for Jewish kids from these communities to form friendships with each other.

The tournament was organized by Suki Berman and Ira Greenspoon. It was sponsored by the Hamilton-Wentworth & Area JCC and the tournament was held at the Dundas Arena. A supper, prize giving and a social at the JCC followed. "It was very successful, reports JCC program director Michele Schneider.

Report on extremism disturbingly prophetic

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Just over a year ago in March 1995, Canada's Jewish community presented to the Canadian government a hard-hitting report entitled Islamic Extremism. It urged action by Canada on several fronts to quell what it described as a considerable threat to peace and security in the Middle East.

The report was unusual in many regards, including the fact that five leading Jewish Canadian organizations — B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Zionist Federations, the Council of Jewish Federations and The Canada-Israel Committee — all got together for once and produced a report that pulled no punches on a touchy Middle East issue.

To avoid misinterpretation or accusations of racism, the report carefully spelled out the important distinction between "Muslim fundamentalism" and "Islamic extremism" in the most unequivocal language possible.

In a statement that in retrospect seems disturbingly prophetic after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the report declared that "fundamentalist extremism is not unique to any one religion or culture."

It explained that "the battle is not with any specific religion, but rather with any group or nation that perverts religion to advance a malevolent political agenda."

In essence, the report was an attack on state-sponsored terrorism against Israel, the United States and the rest of the world.

It named five countries most involved in sponsoring Islamic terrorists — Iran, Syria, Iraq, Sudan and Libya, and the three terrorist groups they back — Hezbollah, Hamas and the Islamic Jihad.

It detailed the chaos and havoc caused so far in Israel, as well as the threat to the peace and political stability in Egypt, Algeria, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria and Turkey.

A year later it is time for an assessment.

The Canadian government has acted on some recommendations; it has resisted others. None were flatly turned down.

Canada quickly made declarations coming out unequivocally against "extremism and terrorism carried out under the guise of religious imperatives." It later supported a United Nations declaration to that effect, took part in the Security Summit in Egypt, and last winter, Solicitor General Herb Gray hosted a meeting in Ottawa on security issues for G-7 countries.

Terrorist groups

Behind the scenes, Canadian diplomats have urged Arab countries and Muslim states to condemn Islamic extremism.

Canadian security agencies such as the RCMP and the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service helped other countries identify and track down movements of known or suspected terrorist groups in Canada.

Immigration officials have denied entry to known terrorists.

That was the easy stuff. After that, the record is cloudier. Canada has been hesitant to give political support and material help to fight terrorism to countries with questionable human rights practices — countries such as Egypt.

Canada has not been overly generous to Israel either. Recently Canada gave $1 million in bomb detection equipment to Israel (actually $250,000 of it went to the Palestine Liberation Organization). By comparison, the United States gave $100 million.

Canada has been reluctant to freeze the bank accounts of terrorist groups and their supporters raising money in this country. Nor has it moved quickly to de-register terrorist fundraising groups posing as charities under Canadian law.

Canada has not cut off economic aid to countries supporting terrorism, nor has it urged the World Bank or the International Monetary fund to do so. It has maintained bilateral relations with these countries. In some cases, trade is actually increasing.

The best example is probably Iran, which the U.S. State Department has described as the worst state sponsor of terrorism.

When the United States imposed an Iranian trade embargo, Europe and Japan quickly began selling the Iranians everything they could no longer get from the United States. The American boycott was a failure.

Trade with Iran

Canada does $350 million worth of trade annually with Iran (about double what it does with Israel) and two-thirds of that is in Canada's favor. Iran buys a lot of Canadian grain and Canada gets a lot of cheap oil.

The Liberal government, which has been reluctant to even criticize countries which don't respect basic human rights, is not about to cut off trade with Iran just to please Israel.

There are so many third countries willing to re-export Canadian-made high technology to the Middle East that effective export controls are virtually non-existent. The best in Canadian high technology eventually ends up in the hands of terrorists everywhere.

However, some progress may be made this fall.

A Commons committee is scheduled to study state-sponsored terrorism, human rights and global security. Then, finally, the issue may get the airing it so rightly deserves before a national audience.

Human rights on election agenda

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The leaders of the two main B.C. parties seeking to run the province after the May 28 election stressed the importance of upholding human rights and providing anti-racism programs.

The B.C. Liberal party believes education is the best tool for teaching tolerance and understanding, and a B.C. Liberal government will encourage government ministries, agencies and crown corporations to identify where public education programs are required to facilitate this so that British Columbians "can live free from the fear of hate crimes," said Liberal leader Gordon Campbell in a letter to the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region (CJC-P).

He was responding to a questionnaire on the party's human rights and anti-racism policy sent to both the Liberal and ruling NDP parties.

Campbell, a former Vancouver mayor, said legislative action will include a review of current human rights legislation to determine if additional steps should be taken so that "the rights of all groups in our society can be protected ... Our principle is that care be taken in a democratic society to balance our fundamental right of freedom of speech with the rights of the people to be protected from hate crimes."

At times, says Campbell, human rights initiatives will be supplemented by law enforcement measures. "A Liberal government will prosecute hate crimes to the full extent of the law."

The Liberal leader says his party "recognizes B.C.'s economic advantages arising from the cultural and religious diversity of the population ... we believe this diversity is to be recognized, valued and celebrated, for it is one of the ties that link us to estabishing emerging economies the world over."

Premier Glen Clark, responding for the NDP, pointed to the steps already being taken to teach high school students about the Holocaust. The current History 12 curriculum covers the 20th century, which includes World War II and the Holocaust as a major area of study. A new Social Studies 11 is being created with emphasis on the Holocaust. He added that many students participate in annual Holocaust symposiums presented by CJC-P.

Discussing a recent decision to set up a Human Rights tribunal to hear cases from the B.C. Human Rights Commission, Clark said all complainants to the commission will have access to tribunal hearings through the legal aid system. A number of damage instruments are available in awards for contraventions of the Human Rights Code, such as cease and desist orders and awarding of legal costs, but no punitive damages are offered.

Clark said the NDP government ensures police participation in information sharing on hate motivated activities, both in British Columbia and with other Canadian police forces. The government is setting up a hate-crime team comprising representatives from the government and police to investigate the nature and scope of hate crimes and coordinate responses to hate. In addition, the attorney general will assist police forces in setting up and training hate-crime units, and aid prosecutions.

Winnipeg's Sharon Home looks south towards future

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – The Sharon Home, this city's Jewish nursing home, is looking south.

At a Town Hall meeting Daniel Ruth (formerly of Toronto), the Sharon Home Inc.'s CEO, outlined long range plans for the north Winnipeg institution including the creation of a 61-bed satellite site and a 30 to 40 suite supportive housing complex to be located in south Winnipeg.

"Fifty percent of the Winnipeg Jewish community now lives in the south end," he reported. "By the year 2011, the proportion is expected to increase to 60 percent. Some extended care beds are going to be needed in the south end."

The benefit of a supportive housing model, he noted, is that operating costs are half those of a nursing home. "We want to help keep seniors in their homes as long as possible," Ruth said. "It is a less costly alternative and it is what most of our clients and their families prefer."

Founded in 1912, the Sharon Home currently is a 229-bed, licensed personal care home. It provides a variety of medical and therapeutic services as well as social programming for its residents. It also offers an adult day-care program and respite care.

In terms of expansion, Ruth noted that there is still "a significant amount of work to be undertaken to translate the vision to reality."

Sites have to be selected and funding has to be raised.

"In the current fiscal climate, we cannot look to Manitoba Health for any capital funding," he said. "Much of it will have to come from the Jewish community. We are looking at a 15- to 20-year time frame."

Mideast free trade urged

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy said he would like the free trade agreement under negotiation between Canada and Israel to be extended to other Middle East countries.

Broadening the agreement would be "a sign peace pays in the most practical way" and help ensure that any peace treaties between Israel and its Arab neighbors mean more than an end to hostilities, he said.

A comprehensive trade arrangement would promote the economic development of the region, "bringing alive" a peace on paper, he said.

Only "technical details" remain in the current talks, and he expects a bilateral agreement to be signed by the summer.

Axworthy invited the Jewish and Arab communities in Canada to cooperate in encouraging Israel, the Palestinians and Arab nations to keep on the course of peace.

The state of Arab-Israel relations today, Axworthy said, "provides an unparalleled opportunity for the Canadian Arab and Jewish communities to find ways of working together or trilaterally with the government. Linkages between the communities here will be an important signal to those in the Middle East."

Axworthy was the keynote speaker at the inauguration of the Canadian Jewish Congress Alan Rose Fund for International Human Dignity, attended by about 600 persons at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

The event highlighted the burgeoning dialogue between Canadian Jews and Arabs, and featured addresses by Montrealers Hani Shennib, president of the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations, and Stephen Cohen, president of the Institute for Middle East Peace and Development.

Present were ambassadors Tajeddine Baddou of Morocco and Abdel Kamil of Mauritania; Kuwaiti embassy counsellor Abdullatif Al-Mawash; Baker Abdel Munem, the representative of the General Delegation of Palestine in Canada; and Israeli envoys Eli Yerushalmi and Daniel Gal.

In a carefully worded speech, Axworthy said Canada wants to play a role in the peace process that draws upon its talents for bridge-building and laying the groundwork for democratic values.

Canada is working "behind the scenes" on multilateral discussions with some 40 countries, as well as the Palestinians, on such topics as water resources, arms control, refugees and other matters whose settlement will be necessary for any peace to last, he said.

Canada is assisting with projects that bring Israelis and Palestinians together, such as seminars on human rights legislation and promotion of democracy in the classroom.

Both Cohen and Shennib spoke of the need to deepen the contact between their communities, but it was evident that there are serious differences in their positions.

Shennib took exception to audience questions suggesting that Jerusalem must remain the undivided capital of Israel and that Syria and Iran are the main sources of terrorism.

Libyan-born Shennib said Arabs and Jews should dialogue as Canadians who, because they share a heritage in the Mideast, have a common interest in what happens there. But both communities, he believes, should avoid identifying with any political party or faction.

To him, Jerusalem is the "shared heart" of Israel and Palestine, which he likened to Siamese twins, and must be the capital of two states.

Cohen said this is the wrong time to press Canada to move its embassy to Jerusalem. "When Jerusalem is recognized as a multiethnic city, when all religious rights and places are respected, I believe the Arab countries will recognize Israel's capital is Jerusalem."

Shennib warned that labelling certain Arab nations as terrorists is unproductive.

He said he had found it difficult to participate after the Israeli bombing of Kana, a refugee camp in Lebanon. "We strongly condemned the [bus-bombing] terrorism in Israel and we were disappointed that CJC did not as strongly condemn the camp bombing."

Cohen said Canada could do more to aid the economic development of Palestinian areas, because this is "the most important deterrent to the triumph of despair and anger" that lead to violence.

The Canadian Arab and Jewish communities have a role to play in reducing the hatred between peoples that continues at the grassroots level, despite their leaders' move towards peace, Cohen said.

Shennib said they can do much together in the areas of economic development, health and education in the Mideast.

Dream of sovereignty won't die

Quebec's right to declare sovereignty unilaterally, of seeking to block a basis for a separate Quebec to form ties with the rest of Canada.

Bouchard suggested that despite being "provoked," he would resist the impulse to call an early provincial election.

He said his priorities now are to govern and to rebuild Quebec's economy, although he also said he had no intention of attending a planned economic summit meeting of the premiers.

"How can you have a nice photo opportunity with Jean Chrétien when he is directly assaulting Quebec's fundamental rights?" he asked.

"We're late and we have so much to do, and I would hate to be delayed by a constitutional quagmire."

Earlier, Bouchard, who spoke entirely extemporaneously, referred to the recent "matzahgate" affair, suggesting that the episode was not "helpful."

But most of his remarks were devoted to building the case for sovereignty and assuring the Jewish community that the province remains a "stable" and peaceful place, and certainly more "tranquil" than the United States to the south.

"All in all, the book on Quebec democracy is a good book," he said. "But it's time to turn the page."

Maryse Ohayon, president of the Communauté Sépharade du Québec, asked Bouchard whether his government was making "pious" promises in expressing the intention of facilitating the integration of minorities into Quebec society.

"Those are our wishes, but they are not pious," Bouchard replied, saying his government would implement concrete measures to that effect.

Lana: A brand worth remembering

Three generations ago, Harry and Faye Daiter opened the family's first dairy and cheese store in Kensington Market. Along with other quality dairy products, that first store sold a tasty low fat cheese which would, in time, make Daiter's famous in Toronto

Lana brand is that same original low fat cheese; all that has changed is the name. Family partners Ron and Rene, and their sons Joel and Stephen Daiter, are carrying Harry and Faye's tradition of healthful, delicious dairy products into a generation that is more health-conscious than ever before.

Lana Low Fat Cheese is smooth, tasty and creamy-white. It's great on a bagel with lox, surrounded by fresh fruit, in a vegetable salad — or simply on a spoon by itself. Rene Daiter even knows people who have baked with it. There are no additives or preservatives.

Lana Low Fat Cheese is kosher, under Congress supervision (COR 189D).

Other delicious, healthful Lana products are 0.5% skim milk yogurt, 2% cottage cheese, 3.5% table yogurt, and 14% sour cream. For more information call us at Daiter's 416-746-2302.

Orthodontics isn't just for kids

Gone are the days when wearing braces was just for kids and meant being embarrassed about having a "tin grin." In fact, adults comprise about one quarter of the patients in many orthodontic practices. Modern orthodontic treatment is now being done with small braces that are glued to the surfaces of the teeth, and clear or tooth-coloured braces are common.

One of the main reasons that people seek orthodontic treatment is to improve the appearance of their smile, which can produce significant psychological benefits, but straightening the teeth can also correct a bad bite, and makes it easier to keep the teeth clean, thereby helping to prevent later periodontal problems.

The family dentist will often be the first one to identify potential problems and may recommend that an orthodontic opinion be obtained. In the case of children, early assessment is important because certain problems associated with the development of the jaws can be intercepted while the child grows. Some of the things to look for are teeth that protrude, and crooked or crowded teeth.

SEA CHEF

KOSHER BREAKTHROUGH WITH SURIMI AT SEAFOOD WAREHOUSE

The Hebrew Scriptures are quite clear about fish: if it hasn't got fins and scales it can't be eaten. About 20 per cent of Israelis keep strictly to kosher eating laws, while more than half keep kosher food in the home but are flexible outside. Only a tiny minority permit any crustaceans in their refrigerators.

Nonetheless, in the past few years something close to shrimp, scallops, crab and squid has been served in homes and weddings and bar mitzvahs.

In 1989, an Israeli company, Sea Chef, which had made its mark manufacturing fish fingers and schnitzels, from hake and Nile perch, took a risk and began producing a line of surimi-based seafood analogues which caught on immediately. Sales today are close to $10 million of which £700,000 is from exports primarily to Italy, France, Spain, Canada, and U.S.A.

Sea Chef bought its knowledge and equipment from Multifood and sent technicians to Los Angeles and Minneapolis to learn how to use surimi. That was the easy part. What followed was a campaign to assure Israelis that the products were 100 per cent kosher.

Company export manager Arle Inber explains: We needed flavouring that duplicated seafood and tried a good number of samples. When we finally chose Tastemaker of the USA it was in large part because they are located near a Jewish population and we could get a rabbi over there to certify every shipment as kosher.

Certifying the pollock, which is the basis for Sea Chef's surimi, was a far more complicated matter. The company buys some 200 tonnes of the fish each year and every time it orders a shipment it sends Rabbi Michael Keller from Israel to the fishing boat to inspect the catch and make certain nothing is added in the processing.

Rabbi Keller has stood on the decks of vessels from a dozen nations in north Sea, Alaska, and beside the icebergs of the Arctic, just to reassure the Israeli public that the fish their 'shrimp' are made of is kosher.

Why all the bother? 'Even 10 years ago, it would have been a waste of time.' says Mr. Inbar. 'But since then Israelis learned to travel abroad and they have been introduced to seafood and like it.

"One of the things they most missed when they returned home was the seafood. Kosher food is quite boring and the public is highly receptive to new cuisine. We spotted the niche and haven't looked back."

"Shrimp is our best seller followed by crab flakes. Our scallop and calamari analogues are a much tougher sell, because most Israelis aren't familiar with the real thing. For that reason, we are most reluctant to enter the market with a lobster analogue."

Sea Chef prides itself on developing its own creations, the company claims its calamari rings are the only such product in the world.

The company's first public showing at the Star exhibition in Paris in 1994 was a notable success. Sea Chef's line conforms to ISO 9002 international quality standards and the taste and presentation were also at an international level. New markets were opened in southern Europe and for the Jewish populations of New York and South Africa.

"The Spanish and French came up to us and asked why they should sell an imitation to their clients when they can buy the original," recalls Mr. Inbar.

I told them because of the kosher supervision, the fish are uniquely clean. Further they are lower in cholesterol and fat, and fully cooked, ready to eat. But the clincher was the 3 per cent of the population that is allergic to seafood and now had an alternative.

Clearly, Sea Chef has changed the nation's fish eating habits in just seven years and today there are competitors in the imitation seafood market.

Mr. Inbar doesn't believe his company was responsible for the dramatic shift in national fish cuisine. "We didn't make the change," he explains. "We built on a change that was already asking price."

Mr. Ender, Chief Executive officer, works very closely with Sea Chef and Inbar and was granted exclusive rights to Canada for kosher surimi products.

Movement system helps body, mind work together

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The bare gymnasium floor was covered with exercise mats and blankets. A group of men and women clad in socks and sweats hovered around an elderly man who appeared to be walking his hands up and down the back of a young woman kneeling in front of him, her body leaning over a low table.

What was going on was a workshop in the Feldenkrais Method, led by 80-year-old Israeli Shlomo Efrat, a disciple and student of Moshe Feldenkrais, who developed a philosophy and system of movement called Awareness Through Movement (ATM).

Efrat explained to The CJN that he was trying to move the woman's vertebrae "like a snake, which is how it should be."

The intention is "to make everything move in unison — hip bones and vertebrae all together."

The body and the mind work together, Efrat said. "If a part of the body doesn't move, then the cells in the brain that are supposed to move that part don't either. We reverse the process — the brain is supposed to move the joints. We move the joints to make the brain work."

People should know, he said, that there is a way to help themselves. "As long as you live, you learn every day how to move."

While most of the people who use the Feldenkrais method just want to be able to move more comfortably or cure minor aches and pains, Efrat said he has had remarkable success with people who have serious disorders such as multiple sclerosis and cerebral palsy.

"We can't make parts move that won't any more, but we can help other parts to work better," Efrat explained.

A boy with cerebral palsy will blow out a lighter that is moved farther and farther away, "a game he enjoys." The boy controls his breathing better and in a very short time "even walks differently," Efrat said.

"The name of the game is to restore function. If you know how, you can do it in a few minutes."

A person trained in the Feldenkrais method, he said, "can see more than the person himself can. We can show him what he can do to improve or move more or easier where he himself is not aware."

Efrat was brought to Toronto for a series of workshops and private treatments from his home in Amirim, a village just outside Carmiel in the north of Israel.

Maya Zimmerman, a Toronto Feldenkrais practitioner, explained that Feldenkrais, a prominent nuclear physicist, healed himself after a soccer injury by re-educating his body to move naturally and easily, using his knowledge of physics, anatomy, neurology, physiology and psychology.

ATM, which is taught in workshops, "consists of verbally directed, pleasurable and effortless exercises involving highly sophisticated movement sequences which access the sensory motor processes of the brain," she said.

The benefits of the Feldenkrais method, she said, are improved flexibility, breathing and circulation, as well and pain and stress reduction.

Movements are slow and gentle, and everybody works at their own speed.

Zimmerman, a certified Feldenkrais practitioner (that means she has taken a series of formal classes over a four-year period), uses these techniques in the swimming classes she teaches.

"I create an environment of trust, where the child is free to explore and push his or her own boundaries."

Dr. Mel Litman uses Feldenkrais in his medical practice. "It is not so much a treatment as educational — teaching the body how to do things differently. You are learning to use your body most efficiently."

In Ontario, Feldenkrais is considered alternative medicine and thus is not covered by OHIP, but the method is used around the world, especially in Germany, Israel (where Feldenkrais worked) and Australia, "where it is considered mainstream," Lipman said.

Umbilical cord proving useful

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The transplantation of blood cells from the umbilical cord, which is discharged at birth and usually discarded as waste, is proving to be useful — as an effective alternative to direct bone marrow transplants in treating leukemia and other diseases.

Dr. Arnon Nagler, senior physician at Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre's bone marrow transplantation department, says that more than 200 such transplantations have already been performed.

"It's advancing quickly. And one day we hope it will be routine," he said at a presentation during the recent Canadian Hadassah-WIZO national executive meeting.

Nagler heads the 3-year-old Umbilical Cord Blood Bank at the Hadassah Hospital — the only one in Israel — and presented a vivid depiction of the advances made as well as the promise and potential in harvesting and cultivating umbilical cord blood cells.

In his presentation, Nagler showed how the umbilical cord's rich supply of immature blood cells — called hematopoietic cells — evolve into the three types of mature cells in blood: red cells, white cells and platelets, which have the potential to regenerate the bone marrow and therefore make it an effective material for transplant.

It is because such cord cells are immature, he also noted, that they are able to reproduce at a high rate and cause fewer rejection problems after transplantations than does bone marrow.

Because of the lesser need for complete compatibility, transplantations can be done sooner — "in two to four weeks, instead of four months," Nagler said.

Nagler predicted that in the future, cord blood will be used "routinely" to treat conditions, including infectious diseases, sickle-cell anemia, and genetic diseases, such as Tay-Sachs, Gaucher's and thalassemia, which infect Jews at a higher rate.

Although the potential use of umbilical cord blood was first theorized in 1972, Nagler noted that the first actual transplant was performed — successfully — not until 1988 in Paris, on a woman suffering from Fanconi's anemia.

Because the volume of blood available from an umblical cord is so slight, children are most commonly the recipients and banking it is expensive, but Nagler said efforts are underway to increase the volume of transplantable material by "expanding" stem cells and by incubating and growing more cells.

Nagler said at Hadassah, it cost $1,500 per sample, which means "we can only do one or two a day."

Not unsurprisingly, the issue of umbilical cord blood usage has raised a host of new ethical and religious questions in Israel.

Even though such material is usually discarded, mothers are asked for permission to use it.

Religious leaders have also ruled that since cord blood is not fetal tissue, it should be treated as blood, not organ material.

Jewish Agency's activities in Russia under cloud

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Russian authorities have disclosed publicly for the first time that they cancelled the licence of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) because, they charged, its practices were violating Russian law.

In a briefing in Moscow, Russian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Grigory Karasin did not specify what the practices or laws in question were.

"I regret to say that the representative office of this agency violated Russian legislation," he said.

At the same time, he said, the cancellation was reversible. "If the Jewish Agency displays readiness to strictly observe the relevant Russian laws and regulations, the existing problem can be resolved."

Agency officials reacted with concern to this latest development in a month-long imbroglio over their status in Russia, but they suggested that the problem could be solved by meeting the Russians' request to update their registration documents.

Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg said at a news conference last week, "The agency has always complied with all local and national legislation and regulations in every country in which JAFI operates. This is how JAFI has operated in Russia, and it will continue to do so in the future."

When the Russians cancelled the agency's licence last month, Russian and Israeli officials downplayed the move as a bureaucratic, regulatory matter.

The same notification went out to several other foreign non-governmental organizations.

But Russian authorities subsequently began to restrict agency activities, shutting down some local offices and cancelling an immigration seminar.

While Jewish emigration has not been affected, should the agency lose its mandate to operate in Russia – something officials assert is highly unlikely – emigration could be at risk.

The agency has helped hundreds of thousands of Jews emigrate from the former Soviet Union to Israel since the gates reopened in 1989. An estimated two million Jews still reside in the former Soviet Union.

The Jewish Agency is the primary recipient in Israel of funds raised by the United Jewish Appeal in concert with local federations.

Karasin's public statements Tuesday clearly shocked agency officials, who had planned to apply for reaccreditation the next day.

But one highly placed Israeli official who requested anonymity cautioned that the timing probably was only coincidental.

He said Karasin was likely responding to letters from overseas, primarily the United States, pressing the government to explain last month's action.

Still, the remarks triggered alarm in Israel.

Burg told reporters that he had held emergency consultations with Prime Minister Shimon Peres and representatives of the Foreign Ministry, and had spoken on the phone with several Diaspora Jewish leaders.

Burg insisted that "this is not an issue between the states of Israel and Russia, but between Russia and a non-governmental organization."

At the same time, he said, "we are ready for every contingency," but refused to say what steps might be taken, should the Russian government turn down the agency's request for reaccreditation.

Without actually blaming Russian officials, Burg implied that they had stalled the reaccreditation process by refusing to accept the agency's completed application forms.

The news conference was cut short when Alla Levy, director general of the agency's unit in the former Soviet Union, called from Moscow to say she had successfully delivered the forms to the Russian Justice Ministry.

The ministry now has 30 days to accept or deny the agency's application.

But the Israeli source said the latest public comments by the Russian official have elevated the story's profile in Russia and could set off an unpredictable chain of events just as the country is preparing to vote in presidential elections next month.

"The Russian politicians read the newspapers and they will have to respond," he said, adding that they could be angered by the publicity.

Mark Levin, executive director of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, said, "The substance of the situation really hasn't changed," only "the type of attention" it has gotten.

"We'll have to wait and see" what the impact of this latest publicity will be on the agency's operations, he added.

So far, "nothing has changed on the ground in terms of the movement of people."

New community priorities urged

By EMILY D. SOLOFF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CHICAGO – Despite the fundraising appeals of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), Edgar Bronfman believes the Jewish community is spending too much money fighting anti-Semitism and not enough educating Jews about Judaism.

In delivering that message to Chicago-area college students last week, Bronfman, who is WJC president, condemned a fundraising letter the congress sent out over his own signature.

On a whirlwind tour to promote his vision of Jewish renewal on college campuses, Bronfman met with students and faculty at several universities in Chicago.

"There is only one real community agenda," he said. "To create a renaissance of Jewish life, to get awareness of Jewish religion out to Jews."

He talked about setting priorities in Jewish life and took a swipe at Jewish organizations that continue "business as usual" while the number of Jews shrinks.

"Jews are not here only to fight anti-Semitism," he said. "I am not Jewish because of the Holocaust. I won't forget what happened, but I don't spend my time mourning the loss of six million. If Judaism survives, it will be on a positive, not a negative basis."

Bronfman's comments, however, came as the WJC was distributing a four-page letter that said, "Our latest worldwide report on anti-Semitic violence shows that attacks against Jews doubled last year."

In the letter, the WJC asked for contributions because "these virulent anti-Semitic terrorists respect no boundaries."

"This is wrong," Bronfman said when asked about the mailing. "Sure there is some anti-Semitism, but that's wrong. I'm going to have to do something about it. I don't like what they [the professional fundraisers] are doing."

Bronfman, chairman of Seagram Company Ltd., is also chairman of the international board of governors of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life. It was in that capacity that he and Richard Joel, president and international director of Hillel, were in Chicago.

The two spoke to graduate students here in an informal meeting where they answered questions, some of which focused on Bronfman's business acumen.

Although Hillel sponsored the event, Joel made it clear that their visit was to promote Jewish pride rather than organizational affiliation.

Chief Financial Officer

The Jewish Community of Montreal is facing challenges and opportunities that will see it through the next century. A pivotal role will be played by the Chief Financial Officer in securing and maintaining community resources to ensure that our community's needs are properly met now and well into the future.

Reporting to the Executive Vice-President, you will be a member of the senior Management Team. You will be responsible for all aspects of our financial operations including accounting systems, funds management, budget planning and control.

You will provide all appropriate assistance to other managers as well as to beneficiary agencies. Some of your on-going objectives will be improving cost effectiveness and controls, streamlining workflow, honing our computerized accounting system and related procedures.

The successful candidate will have a professional accounting designation and a university degree. A minimum of 10 years of accounting/finance experience is required, with at least 5 in a senior management position. Computer proficiency is essential. You must be well-organized, flexible and have excellent communications skills in both English and French. A flexible schedule is essential to accommodate the availability of volunteers on lay committees.

Make your mark by demonstrating your strong commitment to the future of our community institutions. FEDERATION CJA, which operates Combined Jewish Appeal, is one of North America's foremost community fundraising organizations. Campaign proceeds are used to provide important cultural, educational, welfare, and social services locally and around the world.

Peres is courting Israeli Arab voters

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Prime Minister Shimon Peres is scrambling to shore up his support in Israel's Arab community as the May 29 general election approaches.

Mideast Analysis

Peres is courting Israeli Arabs because, without their massive backing, the Labor party might lose its plurality in the Knesset and Peres himself could be defeated by Benjamin Netanyahu in the race for the prime ministership.

Some 440,000 non-Jewish voters, representing about 12 percent of the electorate, are eligible to cast ballots. They consist of Arab Muslims and Christians as well as Druze, a Muslim sect.

In the 1992 election, the Labor party won 44 Knesset seats, while the Likud garnered 32. By forging a coalition with Meretz (12 seats), and by forming a tacit alliance with two Arab parties holding five seats, the Labor party was able to muster a blocking majority in the Knesset and thus form a government. In return, the late Yitzhak Rabin promised to improve the status and living conditions of Israel's Arab minority of 800,000.

As expected, Arab parties — Hadash (Communists) and the Arab Democratic party — played an important role in Israeli politics. They helped Rabin push through the Oslo peace agreements by the slenderest of margins. And a year ago, in a parliamentary manoeuvre which almost toppled the government, they forced Rabin to freeze a controversial land expropriation plan in Jerusalem.

Of late, Israeli Arabs have flexed their muscles once again. First, Arab leaders protested Israel's 16-day military operation in Lebanon (Grapes of Wrath), which killed upward of 200 Lebanese and Palestinian civilians. Second, they opposed Israel's closure of the territories, a measure taken in response to a wave of Islamic fundamentalist suicide bombings in Israel last February and March which claimed the lives of 59 people.

Peres did not regard their protests lightly. Surveys carried out earlier this year had indicated that Peres would win the allegiance of nine out of 10 Arabs in the direct election for prime minister, and that the Labor party could double its share of the Arab vote to 40 percent.

Now that Operation Grapes of Wrath has ended and Peres has promised to lift the closure after May 29, the Labor party is likely to regain its foothold among Israeli Arabs.

In a further bid to woo Israeli Arabs, Peres has pledged to appoint an Arab minister to the cabinet for the first time, and promised to give serious consideration to releasing from prison Sheik Ahmed Yassin, the spiritual leader of Hamas who has moderated his views.

When the last Knesset was dissolved, there were five Arabs and two Druze in the Knesset, divided between the Labor party (1), Likud (1), Meretz (1), Hadash (2, not counting an additional Jewish member) and the Arab Democratic party (2).

Today, there are three major Arab blocs contesting the election: Hadash and the National Democratic Coalition; the Arab Democratic party and the Islamic Movement; and the Arab Movement for Change (led by Dr. Ahmed Tibi, who serves as Yasser Arafat's advisor on Israeli affairs).

Though divided by ideological differences, these groups are united in their insistence on equal rights for Israeli Arabs, their interest in continuing and speeding up the peace process and their advocacy of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, with East Jerusalem as its capital.

The decision by the Islamic Movement to run in the national election is considered to be the key development in Israeli Arab politics this year. Until recently, the Islamic Movement contested only municipal elections, with fairly successful results. And while radicals within the Islamic Movement sought to maintain this traditional policy, their pragmatic leader, Sheik Addullah Nimer Darwish of Kafr Kassim, felt it was outmoded.

Darwish believes that Israeli Arabs can build a formidable bloc if they unite. By some estimates, they could elect as many as a dozen Knesset members and thereby hold the balance of power. But so far, unity has eluded the community, which is composed of descendants of Arabs who lived in Palestine before Israel's establishment.

Israeli Arabs, though fairly integrated into Israeli society, are torn between their nationality and their identity. And they still lag far behind their fellow Jewish citizens with respect to the disbursement of government funds and employment opportunities. Indeed, some consider Israeli Arabs second-class citizens.

And while few Israeli Arabs have been accused of treason since 1948, the deputy mayor of Um-el-Fahm (the largest Israeli Arab town) was recently charged with transferring more than $3 million to Hamas, while another Israeli Arab was arrested on suspicion of having smuggled into Israel an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber who carried out the March 4 terrorist attack in Tel Aviv.

PA spurns Israel's requests to extradite terrorists

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Palestinian Authority (PA) has reportedly rejected four requests for the extradition of suspected terrorists, which were submitted by Israel last Thursday.

Justice Minister David Liba'i submitted the requests to his Palestinian counterpart, Freih Abu Medein. According to Israel Radio, Abu Medein later said the suspects could not be transferred because they are in PA jails.

The independent monitoring group Peace Watch, however, said yesterday that three of the four are not in jail.

The four suspects are Awad Salameh, one of the 13 leading Hamas activists whose arrest Israel recently requested, who is specifically wanted for involvement in the murder of Lt.-Col. Meir Mintz in December 1993; Muhiadin Sharif, also on the list of 13 wanted Hamas leaders, who is suspected of involvement in both the bus No. 26 bombing in Jerusalem last August and the recent wave of suicide bombings; Abed al-Majid Doudin, who is suspected of involvement in the No. 26 bombing and the Ramat Gan bus bombing last July; and Ala Ahmed Sallah, wanted for murdering an Israeli in Ashkelon in March 1993.

Peace Watch said neither Sharif nor Sallah has been arrested.

Doudin was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment last August, and is still officially in prison. According to Peace Watch, however, he is employed by the PA security forces and has freedom of movement in Jericho.

Salameh, Peace Watch said, is the only one actually in custody. He was sentenced to five years last September and released after less than a month; then rearrested in March at Israel's request, and subsequently released again. However, according to Peace Watch, he has since been arrested a third time.

Under the Oslo accords, the PA is obligated to comply with any Israeli request for extradition, unless the suspect is in jail in the PA. In that case, the PA would be obligated to transfer him as soon as he was released from jail.

In practice, however, the PA has failed to comply with any of Israel's 14 previous requests and, according to Peace Watch, several senior PA figures have gone on record as stating that they have no intention of complying with such requests.

Peace Watch said the PA's failure on this issue is a clear violation of the accords.

The new requests are the first Israel has submitted since September 1995, and are surprising in light of the fact that several ministers, including Liba'i, have said such requests are useless because of the PA's failure to comply.

However, Liba'i said it is important to have these requests on record, to deter the PA from letting the suspects out of jail.

In the past, Peace Watch noted, the PA has sentenced terrorists only in response to the threat of an Israeli extradition request.

cult to detect. Less than one kilogram was enough to destroy several rooms and badly damage the second floor of the hotel. There were, however, no other injuries.

Makdad was trained by Hezbollah to carry out the attack, and the organization's spiritual leader knew in general about the plan, according to security sources.

He also spent several days at the Iranian Embassy in Beirut before making his way to Israel, the sources said.

Using a stolen British passport, Makdad took a Swiss Air flight from Zurich to Tel Aviv on April 4. He was apparently carrying the explosives with him, perhaps hidden in the fake antenna of a small clock-radio found among his belongs in the hotel. The radio was also re-wired to operate as the timer for a bomb.

Makdad spent five days in Tel Aviv, where he stayed at a hotel near Dizengoff Centre. He took a train to Jerusalem on April 9, checked into the Lawrence Hotel on Salah a-Din Street, which largely caters to budget travellers from Europe.

"I remember that he checked in about 2 p.m.," said a hotel worker. "He spoke in English, but it wasn't very good. He said he would be staying five nights."

On the hotel register, Makdad misspelled the family name on his stolen passport, writing "Andrew Nemam" instead of "Newman," in large capital letters. He gave his place of birth as London, birth date as April 14, 1970, and profession as accountant.

The hotel worker said that in retrospect, it is apparent that Makdad acted suspiciously, but while he was at the hotel, no one took notice of him, except to note he never ate breakfast at the hotel, though the meal came with the room, and he left every morning and didn't return until evening.

"He gave the bellboy a big suitcase and a plastic bag, and let him carry it up to his room for him," the worker said. "I remember the bellboy complaining that he didn't give him a tip."

Makdad was described as having "a Mediterranean complexion," and being nicely dressed.

Security sources said investigators are still trying to uncover the people here with whom Makdad was in contact. Makdad himself, because of his injuries, can hardly speak, the sources said.

The initial indication at the scene of the explosion was that Makdad was a British tourist, and Israel contacted London for help in the investigation. But it was quickly discovered that the British passport found in Makdad's room was stolen three years ago in Paris.

British intelligence remains involved in the investigation, as they are interested in how the stolen passport made it from Paris to Beirut. The passport picture was changed from Newman's to Makdad's, but no other changes were made.

No concessions to Orthodox, Liberal Jewish groups urge

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – A broad coalition of liberal Jewish organizations is appealing to both Labor party leader Shimon Peres and Likud chief Benjamin Netanyahu not to make any concessions to the Orthodox political parties that could damage the cause of religious pluralism in Israel.

The groups say they are concerned that the issues of religious pluralism will be sacrificed as political leaders work to forge coalitions with Orthodox political parties to muster a Knesset majority after the May 29 elections.

The groups, coming together under the newly formed North American Coalition to Advance Religious Pluralism in Israel, are sending the candidates for prime minister an open letter urging them not to "further erode the protection of civil rights and religious freedom" in Israel.

Members of the coalition include the American Jewish Congress (AJC), the New Israel Fund, the World Union of Progressive Judaism, all the central organizations representing Reform and Conservative Jews, and the Federation of Reconstructionist Synagogues and Havurot.

The coalition's appeal comes in the wake of a series of recent Israeli Supreme Court decisions that have begun to erode the Orthodox monopoly on issues of religious status in the Jewish state.

Those decisions have led the liberal religious movements to feel hopeful that they might attain official recognition in Israel.

At the same time, most of the court decisions have not been implemented and could be nullified by political deals made with the Orthodox.

The concerns were exacerbated when even sympathetic Labor party officials recently made it clear that issues of religious pluralism are secondary to concerns about national security.

Orthodox leaders are determined to maintain the status quo that has existed since the founding of the state and gives the Orthodox rabbinate control over government-sanctioned marriages and divorces and over supervision of religious institutions.

It is that authority, the Orthodox say, which has prevented Diaspora ills such as intermarriage from gaining a foothold in the Jewish state.

In a draft of the letter, the coalition warns: "To agree to further concessions would cast a longer shadow over Israel's democratic character, create a crisis with world Jewry at precisely the moment when both of you have made Israel-Diaspora relations a priority and weaken opportunities for Israelis to deepen their Jewish identities.

"We cannot emphasize enough the damage we fear may result from making political concessions in coalition negotiations which would perpetuate and even exacerbate these denials of religious rights and opportunities for our people in Israel," the letter says.

The coalition is "trying to make as firm a statement as one can and to mitigate any damage that will be done" by the political wrangling, said Phil Baum, executive director of the AJC.

When asked whether the letter was intended to intimate that if the cause of religious pluralism is discarded in the course of the political negotiations, it would threaten to rupture the relationship between Israel and liberal Diaspora Jewry, Baum said no.

"We will not break off with the people of Israel on this issue," Baum said. "We don't believe it will be a rupture of our relationship, but we think it's important that our views on this issue be heard and understood."

Recent Israeli Supreme Court decisions include one early last autumn that mandates inclusion of non-Orthodox representatives on the religious councils of each city, which control everything from kashrut certification to mikvot.

Several of the country's religious councils, including the one in Jerusalem, have refused to reconvene rather than permit non-Orthodox representatives to participate. As a result, no religious councils now include Reform or Conservative representatives.

The court also issued a decision last November that leaned toward recognizing Reform conversions but ordered the Knesset to decide the matter definitively through legislation.

The Knesset, in recess prior to the national election, has not taken up the issue.

And last autumn, for the first time, the Ministry of Education began distributing funds to develop curricula in the public schools to teach about non-Orthodox views of Judaism.

Alarm bells sounded over pre-election shooting

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israel's political leaders called on their supporters to avoid violence after this week's shooting of a Russian immigrant who was hanging Labor party posters.

Artur Yarusky was shot twice in the leg by a gunman who police said drove a car rented by the Likud election campaign centre.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres deplored the incident, as did Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Peres' rival in the race for prime minister.

"I call on everyone to do their utmost to ensure that incidents like this one are not repeated," Peres said during a campaign stop.

Foreign Minister Ehud Barak urged Labor party activists not to be pulled into what he termed "Likud provocations."

But Likud officials said the man arrested by police as the suspected gunman was not a party activist, adding that he had merely been hired to put up posters.

The shooting was not an organized attempt "to intimidate Labor activists," said Likud spokesperson Michael Stoltz.

Netanyahu called on all political parties to eject violent elements from their ranks.

Previous election campaigns in 1981 and 1984 were marred by clashes, including fistfights, between Likud and Labor supporters.

But last week's incident was believed to be the first shooting linked to a political campaign.

Coming little more than six months after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the incident sounded alarm bells throughout Israel.

Knesset members agreed to put a discussion of the incident on the agenda for the special Knesset session to be held this week.

The shooting occurred about 5 a.m. in Herzliya, north of Tel Aviv.

Speaking to reporters from his hospital bed, Yarusky said he had been hanging up posters when a car drove up.

Four people got out and ordered him to stop, he said. When he refused, one of them fired a gun three times, hitting him twice before the group drove away.

Herzliya police questioned two suspects that afternoon and were reportedly looking for two other known suspects.

The lawyers of the detainees maintained that their clients had no connection to the incident and were hanging campaign posters elsewhere when the shooting occurred.

Satelite launch puts Israel in exclusive high tech club

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Champagne flowed and technicians breathed easier, following the successful launch of the Amos 1 communications satellite last Thursday morning. The feat puts Israel into an exclusive club – only eight other nations are capable of developing and producing communication satellites.

The European Space Agency (ESA) Ariane-4 rocket was launched just before 5 a.m. in South America. The Amos entered a low elliptical orbit, and it will take some six weeks to be manoeuvred into its geo-stationary orbit and for the system to start operating.

"Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) devoted great technological, economic and human effort to give birth to one of its greatest achievements," said IAI president Moshe Keret. "We see this launch as a very important milestone, not just for IAI, but for the State of Israel as a whole."

The Amos cost $120 million, plus another $30 million for the Ariane launch. Israel chose the Ariane, as it has the best record for successfully putting satellites into space. The launch took place at the ESA launch centre in Kourou, French Guiana, and the Amos shared the rocket with Palapa-C2, a satellite sent up by Indonesia.

There was tension in the Amos Ground Station, near Yehud, as it was feared the launch would be scrubbed when the countdown was halted with six minutes to go, after communication problems developed with the Indonesian satellite. Possible thunderstorms also put a question mark on the launch.

But after a 25-minute delay, the rocket soared into space. What followed was a nerve-wrenching 90-minute wait for the Amos to disengage, open its antenna and, most crucially, open its solar energy panels.

"We went through a week of simulated launches to try to make this one seem routine," said Ze'ev Nahmoni, a supervisor and head of IAI's electronic group. "I kept the champagne bottles well out of sight and only brought them out when the panels opened."

Technicians in "mission control" shouted with joy and clapped as each stage passed successfully. In a nearby room, the technicians and engineers who built the Amos, watched with their families, as they followed its progress.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who was instrumental in starting the Amos project in 1988, sent a letter of congratulations to IAI, praising the successful launch.

"Launching the Amos into space puts Israel into the "Club of Eight" of countries operating communication satellites, and for this the entire nation should be proud," he said. "This satellite brings the State of Israel to a new era in communications ... and is an expression of Israel's high technical capability."

Israelis won't see the effects of Amos for some time, since the communication revolution is a slow process, said David Pollack, general manager of Spacecom, the group which is marketing the satellite's telecommunications service.

"Our state has good communications. Israelis will feel the Amos when they want to use the unique elements of the satellite. There will be a revolution, but it will take time," Pollack said. "There is an existing infrastructure, so there won't be a revolution overnight, but it will take a very short amount of time. I estimate that to be about a year, so that the cable TV and Internet services will go up on the satellite."

For now, Amos is in an elliptical, 10-hour orbit, coming as close as 300 kilometres to Earth, then shooting to 34,000 km out in space. Over the next 12 days, technicians will use its booster engines to bring it out to a 36,000-km circular orbit, which will maintain it in a stationary position enabling it to focus on the Middle East and Eastern Europe.

The Amos ultimately will be stationed at 4 degrees west, high above the west coast of Africa. It is scheduled to begin operations on July 1. The 996-kg. satellite has a 10-year life expectancy.

IAI officials insist it is a strictly civilian satellite and has no direct military purposes.

Pollack said Israel's three TV stations and Bezeq have purchased transponders, and that negotiations are under way with the cable TV stations and Internet carriers. He said there are intensive negotiations with Hungary, but noted that many potential clients were waiting for a successful launch before committing themselves. He said several Arab states have expressed interest in leasing transponders.

Water issues discussed

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Some 150 delegates from the Middle East and elsewhere met this week in Tunisia to discuss regional water problems in the framework of the Madrid peace talks.

The working group, which last met in Jordan in June 1995, gathered last week to discuss water management, conservation, data exchange and regional cooperation.

It is one of five multilateral working groups established after the 1991 Madrid peace conference to discuss regional development in the Middle East as well as issues relating to Israel and its Arab neighbors.

One of the projects discussed this week in Tunisia is a regional water data bank. The project, which has a $12-million budget, involves Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians.

In a separate development, three Tunisian officials arrived in Israel the same day to pave the way for the opening of their economic interest office in Tel Aviv, Shalom Cohen, head of the Israeli interest office in Tunis, said in an interview.

It remains unclear when the Tunisian office will open in the Jewish state.

Portfolios not yet announced

JERUSALEM – Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has delayed announcing his ministerial portfolio assignments amid reports that he has been negotiating with Islamic fundamentalist leaders to have them join the self-rule authority.

Arafat last week named 23 members to the Executive Authority, which will have the functions of a cabinet, but he did not assign portfolios, saying that he might make more appointments.

He told the Palestinian Council that he might not finalize the list of portfolio assignments for another week or more.

Ain a triple threat athlete

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eva Ain's basketball season ended on something of a sour note recently as her Markham Gems hoops squad first won and then lost a provincial championship semi-final game to Metro Raiders.

Refereeing was the culprit, as officials of the Ontario Basketball Association and the tournament convenors ordered the teams back on the court after Markham had apparently won by a single point.

A bad call by a referee led to a protest by the Raiders, who had apparently lost the game.

As Ain describes it, the referee did goof, but ordering the teams back on the court because of that mistake took the wind out of the Gems' sails. Here, in a nutshell, is what happened:

With Markham trailing by one point with 41 seconds left to play, the Gems took a foul. Instead of giving the Raiders two shots as was required, the ref gave them one and one — if the foul shooter missed the first shot, there would be no second try.

As it happened, the shooter missed, Markham got the ball, came down court and drew a foul. Markham's foul shooter sank her first try and missed her second, but the Gems got the rebound, sank it and ended up winning by one.

Until the officials got involved.

After some consultation, they ordered the teams back on the court to replay the last 41 seconds plus an additional five minutes. It was all too much for the Gems, who in the end succumbed by nine points. Their emotional letdown carried over to their next game, the bronze medal matchup, which they lost, leaving them in fourth place in the provincial tournament.

Despite that unfortunate turn of events, Ain said she "played very consistently during the weekend [championship]. I played really good defence."

Considering her task was covering the Raiders' best player, a ringer recruited just for the tournament from the University of Windsor, she did herself proud. All in all, Ain, a five-foot-eight shooting guard, averaged eight points a game to go with a per game average of six assists and seven rebounds.

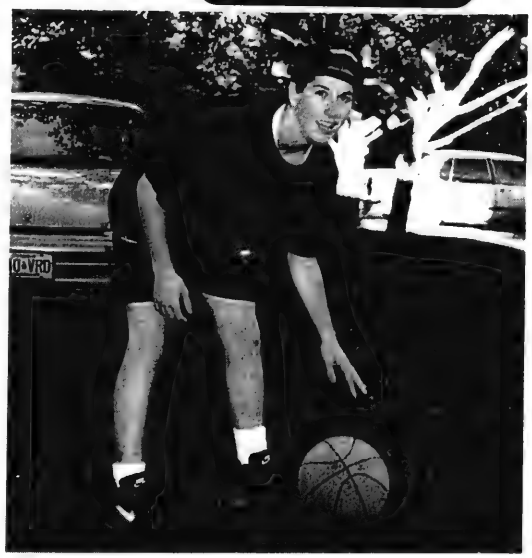
With the basketball season over, Ain is setting her sights on her number 2 sport — softball. A triple threat athlete who also plays high school volleyball, Ain for the past few years has been good enough to play rep softball with the Oakville Outlaws. Batting fifth or sixth, she likes to swing for the fences and counts consistency as one of her top qualities.

This year, she's cutting out rep ball and will play only for her school, Earl Haig. That way, she'll leave herself more time to prepare for tryouts next fall with Guelph University's basketball team.

She's already met Guelph's coach, seen the team play and she's confident she can fit right in. Her confidence level was given a boost this year by playing with and against some of the best players in Metro — and not looking out of place doing it.

Like many kids, Ain took her first step to competitive basketball by shooting hoops with her dad in the driveway.

A good all-round athlete, she also played baseball from grades 4 to 10 on a boys team. In Grade 10, she switched to girls softball and she's captained the Earl Haig senior team for the past two years.



Eva Ain

She's also served as co-captain of the school's senior basketball team for the last two years and led the team in scoring for three years. During that time Earl Haig has reigned as city champions.

Adding to her impressive credentials was her captaincy of the girls' basketball team at the 1994 JCC Maccabi Youth Games in Cleveland. She also played on the '92 and '93 Maccabi teams in Baltimore and Pittsburgh.

As for volleyball, that's more of a recreational activity for Ain, though she's played on Earl Haig's senior team for the past three years.

"I'm athletic. I can't be inactive," she said in what has to rate as a monumental understatement.

"I work hard, so I can accomodate everything," she said, referring to her A scholastic average.

A fierce competitor, Ain loves the environment that goes along with sports. "I love the game, the competition, and I love being with girls who love the game and who love having a good time," she said.

Bruce Searle, director of athletics at Earl Haig, points out that "as captain [of the basketball team], Eva has shown the desire to win by setting an example of hard work and as a person willing to play for the benefit of the team ... Eva will be nominated for athlete of the year honors, inasmuch as she plays three sports at a sophisticated level."

Gymnasts vault to medal podium

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish athletes from the Vaughan Gymnastics Club came up big at the recently concluded All-Ontario Provincial Championships, with Ron Zahavi and Justin Gerson winning gold medals in their age categories.

Gerson, an 18-year-old nationally-ranked athlete, finished first all-round among juniors, while Zahavi, 9, was first all-round among cadets.

The all-round score is based on results in six events — floor exercises, rings, pommel horse, vault, parallel bars and high bar.

A first in floor exercises, a first in rings and a second in parallel bars vaulted Zahavi into first place.

Gerson won golds in pommel horse and rings, and silvers in floor exercises and parallel bars. In recent years, he has reached the top echelon of Canada gymnasts. Late last year, he represented Canada at the Union of West Vienna Cup and finished third. In March this year, he took top honors at the Elite Canada competition in Montreal.

In other results, Rosty Serebryany, 18, came in eighth overall in the senior national category, with his best showings a fourth in rings and a sixth in pommel horse. Ruslan Lechkevitch, 18, was ninth in senior nationals with a sixth in parallel bars his best result.

In other events, Jeff Levine came second in the national novice category for 14-year-olds; Eitan Silberman was second overall in the national tyro class for 13-year-olds; Jonathan Muskat was eighth in national tyro.

Levine earned his silver medal with a first place finish in rings, second in floor exercises and third in pommel horse. Silberman got silvers in parallel bars and in high bar and thirds in floor and pommel horse.

Muskat's best event was a third in parallel bars.

Meanwhile, Tamir Silverman finished 15th in the Argo A category. His best showing was a third in rings and a fifth in pommel horse.

Athletes from other clubs included Jonah Swartz of Nepean Corona, who came in seventh in national tyro, and Michael Levy of Scarborough Olympic, who was third in the same class.

Jewish entertainment thrives at cafe.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Free Times Cafe, one of Toronto's best-known folk music havens, marked its 15th anniversary by offering live Hebrew and Yiddish music on Sunday afternoons.

The music offered at "brunch-time" — 12 and 1'oclock p.m. — was supposed to be a temporary feature, but it has been so well-received that cafe owner Judy Perly has added other Jewish live entertainment, including storytelling, and she's extended the program indefinitely, she said.

Perly had been casting about for a new idea for Sundays and the Jewish music is drawing people downtown from as far away as North York and Thornhill, she noted.

The Free Times at 320 College St. is sandwiched between Kensington Market and the South Annex, in the heart of the old Jewish neighborhood. People can come to listen to the music and reconnect with their roots in the historical surroundings, Perly said.

"It was such a vital area. There is so much history here. Everybody tells me a different story."

Perly creates a haimish atmosphere by greeting the guests, and ushering them to tables in a back room with a stage, where the various entertainers perform.

On this particular Sunday it was the versatile Batsheva, who sings in Yiddish, Hebrew and Ladino. She handed out song sheets and when she sang Oyfen Pripachik, many of the guests joined her in this Yiddish classic.

"The music has always been the thing that sustained Free Times," Perly said. "The cafe is the longest standing venue for folk music in Toronto. We've been offering live music or poetry and prose reading every night since 1983."

In 1981, musicians began using the back room for music on Saturday nights — there was no stage, no cover-charge, no sound system, and the musicians were paid with free food, but within three years there was nightly live entertainment with major singers and song writers playing on weekends, she said. Some of the artists who have appeared there include Loreena McKennitt, Rambling Jack Elliot, Bob Snider, Ian Tamblin and Danny Greenspoon.

Many folk singers started their careers at the Free Times on the open stage Monday nights when it's geared to new performers.

On Mondays the room is full, because several acts are booked and the performers bring friends and family, Perly said.

"The Free Times has always drawn people because it's a cultural centre," she said, pointing to the current exhibition, paintings by Terry Jones, hanging on the walls.

But serving good food at reasonable prices is not enough, she adds. "The restaurant business tough and competitive. You have to keep coming up with new ideas to survive."

So far the Sunday brunch is working out well, she says. "It's a great event for me personally. I felt that I was separated from the Jewish community. And now I have found a way to reconnect."

Scitex Earnings Drop 78 Percent

JERUSALEM – Scitex Corp.'s first quarter net profits dropped 78 percent to $4.5 million (Cdn.) (11 cents per share) from $24 million during the same period last year, the company said last week.

The better-than-expected results which follow an annual loss of $47 million in 1995 come at a time when the Herzliya-based imaging-systems specialist is battling against a hostile-takeover bid led by Israeli-American entrepreneur Davidi Gilo.

One analyst said the decision of Scitex's major shareholders to reject Gilo's bid puts them under pressure to persuade shareholders that the changes under way in Scitex will significantly improve growth and profitability.

Bienstock gets Gemini for documentary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian producer-director Ric Esther Bienstock was honored recently at the 1996 Gemini Awards for best documentary for Ms. Conceptions, a documentary about single mothers by choice.

Filmed by Bienstock's Toronto-based company, Good Soup Productions Inc., and co-produced with Linda Frum, Ms. Conceptions received record ratings when it was aired on CBC's Witness series. It was also screened at New York's Museum of Modern Art and has been invited to film festivals around the world.

A native of Montreal, Bienstock graduated in film and communications from McGill University in 1981. She worked in numerous productions including a feature film for Warner Bros., The Little Drummer Girl starring Diane Keaton, and Costa Gavras' Hannah K., both shot on location in Israel. She also worked with Leonard Bernstein on a BBC television special about Gustav Mahler.

Producer/director Ric Esther Bienstock on location in Africa

In her mid 30s, Bienstock is fluent in English, French and Hebrew. She lived in Israel for four years, working in the Israeli film industry. Shortly after her return to Canada in 1985, she moved to Toronto.

Working with award-winning film-maker, Simcha Jacobovici, she co-produced Deadly Currents, a feature-length documentary investigating the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. The film won a Genie Award from the Canadian Academy of Cinema and Television.

More recently, Bienstock directed and co-produced the film Ebola: Inside an Outbreak, which was produced for the CBC Witness series and shown on PBS under the title The Plague Fighters.

Her credits include a trilogy of award-winning films shot on location in nine countries across Africa: Meeting the Challenge, Aids in Africa and Burden on the Land.

She has developed a reputation for shooting under difficult and dangerous circumstances because much of her filming has been done in Africa, particularly during the ebola outbreak. Her films are provocative, but still reflect her keen sense of humor.

"I feel privileged to be able to make a living doing something I love so much and it remains a constant challenge to me," Bienstock said. But "right now," she added, "since I am pregnant with my first child, my biggest challenge is going to be how I juggle motherhood and film making."

Economic domination said not to be Israel's goal

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Arab world fears Israel's economic domination of the Middle East, but Israel "has no intention of dominating anyone economically," a top Israeli business figure said here earlier this month.

In fact, it's more important for Israel to cooperate with Arabs and Palestinians in joint ventures and trade, said Dan Gillerman, chair of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce in Israel.

Gillerman drew a rosy economic picture of Israel for a small group of local business leaders, in a program presented by Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and State of Israel Bonds.

The Jewish state has "transformed" from being "small-thinking to being normal and thinking normal." Economically, Israel today is on par with nations like Holland and Denmark, Gillerman said.

"We've gone from being a pack of nerves to bundles of opportunity. Israel is part of a major emerging growth market in the Middle East."

Bundles of opportunity

Foreign investment continues to pour in. Almost all large multinational companies, including such giants as Siemans, Westinghouse and Polaroid, have their regional headquarters in Israel, he noted.

But preventing even more growth in the Mideast is the disparity between Israel and its Arab neighbors, Gillerman said. Israel's Gross National Product (GNP) this year is projected at $87 billion (US) while the combined GNPs for Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority is $56 billion (US).

That translates into a per capita GNP in Israel of $17,000, versus $1,000 for the Palestinian Authority, $800 for Jordan and $600 for Egypt.

That's why it's so important for Israel to reach out to Arabs, "not just for the economy but for politics. Peace must be cemented by economic cooperation."

But at the same time, "Israel is the flavor of the month. That can change. For the foreseeable future, the real dividends of peace will come from the outside world."

Including Canada, Gillerman hopes. He called for increased investment in Israel, which should be made easier in light of the Canada-Israel free trade pact, scheduled to be fully implemented later this year.

And there's much to invest in. Gillerman said Israel exports half of its industrial output, most of it in hi-tech, and is planning over $50 billion worth of infrastructure projects over the next five years.

Correction: A misplaced decimal point crept into the last column, diminishing by tenfold the size of the so-called Great Stone of the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. The Great Stone is roughly 4 metres high by 4 metres deep by 13.5 metres in length.

A little help on becoming a maven in the kitchen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Who doesn't love delectable food? I think you'd be hard-pressed to find such a person on this planet. A fine meal is something to be anticipated and savored.

But memorable repasts do not, willy nilly, come out of the blue. They are based on proper planning, the right fresh ingredients and, of course, sound and time-honored recipes.

The following new cookbooks may not turn you into an instant maven in the kitchen, but will certainly get you started.

At parties, the late Chana Schiff of Montreal would inquire of guests, "May I make you a plate?" Few rejected her invitation. For Schiff, born in Boryslav, Poland, was a wizard in the culinary arts.

With a nod to Clint Eastwood, her delicious kosher recipes have been collected and published under the title You Made My Day (Robert Davies Publishing, $18.99), compiled by her daughter Evelyn Gold.

The book — a treasure trove of traditional East European fare — is wide-ranging, containing recipes for Shabbat, holidays, meats, poultry, fish, vegetables, soups, sauces, salads, pastas and desserts.

In leafing through You Made My Day, I was particularly struck by such mouth-watering classics as cabbage rolls, roast chicken, gefilte fish, cheese blintzes, pea soup and apple strudel, dishes that Schiff could whip up at a moment's notice.

Schiff probably would have appreciated Helen Nash's Lower Fat Kosher Kitchen (Random House, $23.50), which was originally published six years ago and is now available in a paperback edition.

Nash believes, quite rightly, that fine kosher cuisine should not be constrained by artificial restraints. In this progressive spirit, she breaks new ground by building elaborate meals around fairly exotic ingredients and spices like sun-dried tomatoes and coriander. Traditionalists like Schiff might not have been familiar with these condiments, but surely she would have approved of them.

In keeping with the strictures of old-fashioned kosher food, Nash offers recipes for classics running the gamut from cholent to chicken soup.

Beyond these perennial Ashkenazi favorites, Nash serves up tantalizing recipes for, among other things, stir-fried Shiitake mushrooms, curried wontons, bulgur pilaf and steamed salmon steaks with black beans.

The cuisine of North Africa, popularized in the Jewish community by Sephardi Jews, is based on grains, vegetables, fruits, olive oil, garlic and honey.

Vegetarian Table: North Africa (Raincoast, $29.95), compiled by Kitty Morse, a native of Casablanca, is a lavish cookbook filled with wonderful recipes. I highly recommend it.

I savor a bowl of good soup; so imagine how pleased I was to receive A Good Day For Soup (Raincoast Books, $23.95) by Jeannette Ferrary and Louise Fiszer.

This thoughtful compendium, though sadly bereft of photographs, contains more than 200 recipes and is therefore something of a definitive work. Choose from bisques to main-dish stews. This book has them all.

Since specialty cookbooks are fairly rare, I was delighted to read Olives, Ginger and Lemons, distributed in Canada by Raincoast ($12.95 each).

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Ragtime, the Musical, Takes Shape: Last week in Toronto, arts journalists were given an exclusive first peek at four stage numbers from Ragtime, the musical-in-progress that Livent Inc. is developing from the best-selling 1975 novel by E.L. Doctorow. Given that the show isn't set to open at North York's Ford Centre until next January, the pieces seemed surprisingly polished. From both a musical and a lyrical point of view, the compositions seemed strong, the voices solid, the choreography tight.

Afterwards Drabinsky and Doctorow and key members of Livent's dream team for Ragtime sat at a long table on stage and answered questions. "The musical was Drabinsky's idea," said the novelist. "When he came to me, I could tell that he really understood the book and had a passion for it. By the time we had our next meeting I could tell that he had read the book several more times than I had."

Doctorow freely admitted that he didn't like the movie version of Ragtime: "I liked the first 10 minutes but it went on for 2½ hours."

Was he, therefore, "scared" that his book was now being adapted for the stage? "No, not at all," he said. "I think what has happened to me also happened to Bernard Shaw and William Shakespeare. So I'm quite content."

The Ragtime dream team includes director Frank Galati, choreographer Graciela Daniele, playwright Terrence McNally and songwriters Lynn Ahrens (lyrics) and Stephen Flaherty (music).

But it was Drabinsky who held the spotlight the longest. As he revealed, Livent is mounting a new production of the Rodgers and Hart musical Pal Joey. Fundamental to this project, Livent has acquired rights to the entire Rodgers and Hart catalogue.

The Toronto-based company is also developing a musical adaptation of the 1957 film noir classic The Sweet Smell of Success and an original musical, I Love A Parade, to be directed by Harold Prince, with a book by Alfred Uhry, award-winning author of Driving Miss Daisy.

Still, Drabinsky seems most excited by his current project. "Without a doubt, Ragtime is the richest creative experience of my career," he said.

Sephardi History on the Danforth: Two years ago, award-winning Toronto film producer Simcha Jacobovici started his own Orthodox synagogue in his home. For High Holy Days, he rented space in a nearby Greek restaurant, earning his impromptu house of worship the moniker the "souvlaki synagogue."

This year, the congregation, which is now more than 200 strong, is renting space in Riverdale to house a Jewish community centre. Jacobovici's film, Expulsion & Memory: Descendants of the Hidden Jews, is being shown as part of a fundraising benefit.

The film shows modern-day descendants of the Jews who were forcibly converted during the Spanish Inquisition and explores the survival of their culture through art, music and dance. It features Placido Domingo, Zubin Mehta and the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

Live performances by guitarist Aaron Skitri, singer Charly Sibony and a flamenco trio are also scheduled. May 26, 8 p.m. The Music Hall, 147 Danforth Ave., Toronto 416-504- 6662.

In Brief: Encounters '96 features the world premiere of Traces (Tikkun), a chamber opera by Canadian composer Istvan Anhalt, and Goblin Market, a work by Aaron Jay Kernis. Traces (Tikkun), which was inspired by medieval mystical Jewish concepts, features baritone Doug MacNaughton with a 45-piece orchestra. Adults, $15. May 28, 8 p.m. Glenn Gould Studio, Toronto. 416-205-5555.

An Odyssey Through Jewish Music from Biblical Times to the 20th Century, in song, with words by Faye Kellerstein and accompaniment by Jordan Klapman. May 29, 7:30 p.m., Auditorium of the National Library of Canada, Ottawa. 613-726-9330.

A little kitchen help

Beautifully illustrated and well written, these volumes stretch one's imagination and inventiveness and illuminate the gastronomic wonders of the Far East and the Mediterranean.

Asian food is "hot" these days. Is there anybody in the house who can resist a masterful Chinese, Thai or Indian meal?

Asian Collection (Raincoast, no price listed), by Charmaine Solomon, is a handsome coffee-table volume with some 700 enticing recipes. You can spend months, if not an entire year, poking through this excellent book.

Complementing Asian Collection are James McNair Cooks Southeast Asian (Raincoast, $19.95) and Madhur Jaffrey's Quick and Easy Indian Cooking (Raincoast, $22.95).

The first is a showcase for over 70 delectable dishes from Vietnam, Thailand, Indonesia, Cambodia, Malaysia, Myanmar and the Philippines. The second tells you how to prepare a full-course Indian meal in under a half hour.

Who could ask for more?

Future Bakery is a family-run business.
It all started with my Polish grandfather who was a master baker in the court of the Russian Czar Nicholas. In 1952 he and my Ukranian grandmother moved to Canada and started future Bakery. They were looking forward to the "Future" in their new country!
Today my father and I run the bakery and we still use my grandparents' recipies.
So the next time you eat at future, you'll see why it is more than just another bakery!

Lachan Choir prepares for second concert

TORONTO – The Lachan Choir will be performing its second annual concert at the Studio Theatre of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on June 2.

The Lachan Choir, under the direction of Cantor Benjamin Maissner, is joining in the celebration of Jerusalem 3000 by offering an evening of musical tributes to the people and history of Jerusalem. As a Jewish chamber choir, Lachan members are committed to promoting the art of Jewish choral music and bringing it to the highest possible level.

The music the choir is scheduled to perform this year covers a wide range of pieces defining its connection to the City of Jerusalem and its impact on the Jewish people.

The compositions date from as far back as the 12th century, through the classical period, to songs which recall recent historical events. For example, Hakotel by Ganzu and Zeltser was written after the Six Day War. The joyous impact of Jerusalem on our senses is depicted in The Jerusalem Mosaic by Yefim Adler.

Cantor Benjamin Maissner will lead the Lachan Choir's performance

Two contemporary pieces are expressions of hope for the land of Israel. They are John Weinzweig's Am Yisrael Chai and Robert Starer's Ariel.

Tickets are $12 and can be purchased from the Ford Centre at 5040 Yonge St., North York. The concert begins at 8 p.m.

Zimriyah set for May 29

TORONTO – Jewish Music Toronto is sponsoring its annual Zimriyah Choirs Festival at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave., North York, May 29 at 8 p.m. Admission is free.

Yefim Adler composed The Yerushalayim Mosaic.

The Zimriyah annually features Jewish choirs from the Toronto area in a varied program. This year nine choirs are participating.

A special feature of this concert, whose theme is Jerusalem, City of David, in celebration of Jerusalem 3000, will be the world premiere of a specially commissioned work written for all nine choirs combined, The Yerushalayim Mosaic by Yefim Adler.

This is the first work to be commissioned by Jewish Music Toronto, which has been supported by a grant from Ontario Arts Council.

It is also the first public commission for composer Adler since he arrived in Canada from the Soviet Union, where he was a prominent member of the U.S.S.R. Composers' Union who had a string of successful stage and movie productions and performances by such conductors as Maxim Shostakovitch.

Esther Ghan Firestone will conduct the event. For more information call Koffler Centre for the Arts at 416-636-1880 ext. 229.

Soprano Claire Klein Osipov to perform with Jewish Folk Choir

TORONTO – The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir presents soprano Claire Klein Osipov as the guest artist at its Gala 70th annual spring concert on May 26.

The choir will present both old and new music expressing the sorrows and joys of the Jewish experience through the ages.

Osipov, who is from Vancouver, began her career with the choir in 1951 and has since become one of Canada's finest interpreters of Yiddish folk music. She will perform the leading role in the folk operetta Tevye's Hodl by Maurice Rauch, based on the famous story by Shalom Aleichem, as well as some of her favorite Yiddish folk songs.

In addition to some of the traditional music from its past, the choir also looks to the future by offering the premiere of a new work specially commissioned for it through a grant from the Ontario Arts Council: Reflections of Solomon, by Alexander Rapoport. The text is taken from love poems in different languages spoken by the Jewish people.

The choir was founded by immigrant factory workers who wanted to express themselves in song as they did in the "old country." Since then, it has been serving the community by keeping alive the best in the Yiddish musical heritage and introducing new works on Jewish themes by Canadian composers.

The concert begins at 2:30 p.m at Walter Hall, Edward Johnson Building, 80 Queen's Park Cres. W. (behind the McLaughlin Planetarium, south of the Royal Ontario Museum).

The choir is directed by Esther Ghan-Firestone and will be accompanied by Lina Zemelman.

Tickets, at $15, $12 for students and seniors, are available at the door or in advance at Negev, Israel's and Matana Judaica bookstores and Lasting Impressions Photo; or by calling 416-492-7110 or 416-489-7681.

It's time once again for our annual CJN Rosh Hashannah photo essay contest. Look for the rules and information in next week's paper.

Win new biography on Simon Wiesenthal

The CJN has five copies of Hella Pick's Simon Wiesenthal – A Life In Search Of Justice (published by Weidenfeld & Nicolson and distributed by Douglas & McIntyre Ltd.) to give away.

All you have to do is correctly answer the following question: Which notorious Nazi, later captured by the Mossad, did Wiesenthal claim responsibility for tracking down in Argentina?

Write down the answer and send, fax or e-mail it – along with your name, address and phone number– by June 7, 1996 to: Simon Wiesenthal Contest, CJN, 10 Gateway Blvd. Suite 420, Don Mills Ont. M3C 3A1. Fax 416-424-1886 or e-mail 102574.1304 @compuserve.com.

Five winners will be drawn from all correct entries received and the books will be sent to them. Contest not open to CJN employees and immediate families.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I've been out of work for a while now. I wasn't getting any interviews for the longest time and then last week I had four interviews! Every place I went to felt fine, but I haven't gotten any offers yet. I feel confused and nervous. What should I do?

Dear Reader,

First of all, pat yourself on the back. Getting the interviews shows that you're doing something right. You attracted attention with your cover letter, resume or other initial contact with the company. You got the company to agree to meet with you. You can be sure that not everyone who sends in an application got an interview, but you did. Take a second look at your resume and appreciate its visual appeal and the information it contains

If you haven't already done so, send a handwritten thank you note to each of your interviewers. It is always appropriate to thank your interviewers for the time spent with you. It's also an opportunity for you to remind them about your continued interest in the position for which you were interviewed.

Think about the companies you applied to. Did you really feel comfortable with the person who interviewed you or do you just want the job so badly that you made yourself think you felt comfortable with the situation you ended up in, even though it wasn't ideal? Perhaps you targeted your applications in the right departments but the wrong companies.

While you wait for your interviewers to call you back, continue your job search. Apply to companies like those where you got your interviews but perhaps expand your search to include companies in other areas. For example, if you are interested in working in accounting but don't feel quite comfortable within an accounting firm, consider applying for work within other companies. If you have held previous jobs in one particular industry, try companies within that industry.

Another area to examine would be your previous experience, Is most of your experience in non-profit organizations and yet all these interviews were in for-profit places?

Finally, if you have not heard anything after about a week, it is appropriate to call your interviewer and ask if a decision has been made about the person they have chosen. If you do make this call and find out you have not been hired, ask if they are anticipating needing any other staff to do a similar function. Find out how long your resume will be kept on file. Note this information in your records and keep looking for more opportunities.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

It's too close to call

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Both Labor and Likud hailed Sunday night's televised debate between Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Likud candidate Benjamin Netanyahu as a victory for their candidate.

"I thought that we would win the elections even before the debate, but now that it's over, I have no doubt – we are going to win," Netanyahu said shortly after the debate.

However, Labor Secretary-General Nissim Zvilli said, "There is no doubt that Shimon Peres won the debate," adding that it had underscored the differences in ability and experience between the two.

The debate, considered the climax of the election campaign, covered a wide range of issues, including the Oslo agreements, terrorism, Jerusalem and Peres' age.

In the 30-minute debate, each candidate managed to encapsulate his positions.

Peres concentrated on conveying a message of hope and strength, while Netanyahu emphasized fear of terrorism, which he mentioned several times, and the Likud's focus on peace and security.

In his opening statement, Peres charged Netanyahu with concocting "an awful libel" as the basis for his election campaign, summed up by the Likud slogan: Peres will divide Jerusalem. This, he said, had caused Israel and Jerusalem grave damage by turning the status of united Jerusalem from a universally accepted axiom into a debatable issue.

He called on voters not to swallow the Likud's "Soviet brainwashing campaign about dividing Jerusalem."

A labour party activist pastes a campaign poster of Prime Minister Shimon Peres over posters depicting Palestinian President Yasser Arafat as a tightly held hand grenade. [RNS photo]

He stressed that a united Jerusalem will remain Israel's capital and under Israeli sovereignty forever, and no compromise is possible on this issue. "We united Jerusalem and we shall remain united around it," he said.

Netanyahu maintained that in reality, Peres had already divided Jerusalem, by allowing Orient House to operate as the Palestinian foreign ministry and by making the city part of the autonomous region, allowing east Jerusalemites to vote in the Palestinian elections.

He accused Peres of bringing the country to the worst state of

It has been a very odd campaign

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — For the most fateful election in Israel's history, this is a very odd campaign.

Reporters are barred from interviewing politicians. The clearest political messages are articulated by a bunch of zany puppets. Most of the public believes the election will be decided not by the persuasiveness of either candidate, but by Hamas.

These are just a few of the bizarre features of an election that is supposed to determine whether Israel makes peace with all its neighbors by the year 2000, as Shimon Peres promises, or whether it is stripped of security in a suicidal series of pacts, as Benjamin Netanyahu warns.

Terror has been a factor

Given these glaring differences, Peres and Netanyahu sound a surprisingly similar note in the official election propaganda. A white dove opens every Likud television spot and for the first time, the party has incorporated the word "peace" into its slogan, promising "a secure peace."

Meanwhile, Labor has adopted "a strong Israel" as its motto, and Peres is often shown flanked by Foreign Minister Ehud Barak, the tough ex-chief of staff who is the embodiment of Security.

The reason for this is clear. Both major parties are vying for the vital floating vote. "They know that this election is about convincing five to 10 percent of the electorate who are wavering somewhere in the centre of the political spectrum," says Prof. Efraim Inbar of Bar-Ilan University's BESA Centre for Strategic Research. "Each candidate must appear to be respectable, non-threatening, peace-loving and strong."

The News In Brief

International

CANADA

German Fashions

VANCOUVER – The Original Costume Museum Society is producing an exhibition illustrating Jewish contributions to the textile and fashion industries in Germany and Austria prior to Nazi persecutions. The exhibition, opening January 1998 at the Holocaust Education Centre, will display manufactured and couturier garments and accessories with text and photos dating back to 1740.

Fundraisers Recognized

TORONTO – The National Society of Fund Raising Executives, Greater Toronto chapter, the largest professional association of individuals responsible for generating philanthropic support, will recognize the leadership demonstrated by both philanthropists and fundraising executives at the second annual philanthropic luncheon on May 22.

Among award winners will be Dr. Barry and Honey Sherman, who will receive awards for their philanthropic contributions.

ISRAEL

Flight Controllers Protest

JERUSALEM – Israeli flight controllers shut down Ben-Gurion Airport for three hours last week to protest broadcasts by pirate radio stations in the vicinity of the airport that interrupted control tower transmissions.

Radio interference is not a new problem for the flight controllers, but the decision to close the airport came after two planes had trouble landing because of the pirate broadcasts, the director of the airport authority said.

Assassination Attempt

JERUSALEM – An Islamic militant angry at Turkey's military cooperation accord with Israel attempted last week to assassinate the Turkish president.

During a ceremony in the western Turkish town of Izmit, the assailant pulled a gun and pointed it at President Suleyman Demirel.

A plainclothes security guard tackled the man and the gun went off, slightly injuring a policeman and a journalist, but leaving the president unharmed.

Arafat Adviser Bows Out

JERUSALEM – Dr. Ahmed Tibi, the Israeli Arab adviser to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, has announced his withdrawal from the Knesset race.

Tibi told a news conference he did not have enough time to organize his campaign, adding that recent polls indicated that his party, the Arab Movement for Change, would not receive the minimum 1.5 percent of the total vote needed to win representation in the Knesset.

Tibi added that he did not want to split the vote of the Israeli Arab electorate and urged his followers to support parties that back the peace process.

Feld Carr To Be Honored

HAIFA – Judy Feld Carr will be awarded the humanitarian of merit award when the University of Haifa's board of governors meeting is held June 5.

Oman Trade Office

JERUSALEM – A group of Israeli officials departed for Oman last week to prepare for the opening of Israel's first trade office in a Persian Gulf state.

Diplomatic sources in the Omani capital of Muscat would not say when a formal ceremony would be held to mark the opening of the trade office.

WORLD

Lithuanian Departs U.S.

NEW YORK – A Florida resident who admitted to serving in a Nazi-sponsored battalion during World War II has moved to Vilnius, Lithuania.

In an agreement reached with the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, Juozas Budreika, 79, admitted that he wilfully misrepresented and concealed his service in the Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft (Protective Detachment) when he applied for U.S. citizenship in 1967, and earlier when he immigrated in 1958.

Kosher Labelling Laws

WASHINGTON – Congressional sponsors of Food and Drug Administration reform legislation have agreed to include language protecting kosher labelling laws.

Orthodox groups had charged that provisions in the legislation, which seeks to replace existing state food safety and labelling laws with uniform federal laws, would have made it more difficult for consumers to verify the authenticity of kosher products.

Rabbis Graduate

NEW JERSEY – The Institute for Traditional Judaism will hold its first graduation ceremonies on June 9, ordaining four men from the rabbinical school.

Science Olympiyeda

TORONTO – Two Toronto high school students will be among 20 North American students chosen to participate in this year's International Science Olympiyeda, which is operated by the Israel National Agency and the Ministry of Education and Culture.

Yael Berdugo, a Grade 10 student at Ulpanat Orot, and David Levine, a Grade 9 student at Yeshivat Or Chaim, who have been invited to participate in the program, were among 300 students across the continent who wrote the first-round science test last December.

The 20 students will join one student from England and 40 Israelis for a three-week program of study, research and touring, and attend cultural events in Israel.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Pessimism follows leaders' visit with Bouchard

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On one level, the recent, unprecedentedly ambitious Jewish community "parliamentary mission" to Quebec City was an unqualified success.

For 12 exhaustive and exhausting hours, 60 leaders and officials from five Jewish organizations visited the Assemblée Nationale, keeping the lines of communication open with the province's powers-that-be and lobbying fervently and eloquently with government and opposition members for the most important issues on the Jewish agenda.

On another level, however, behind the obligatory rounds of meetings, wining, dining, mutual wishes of goodwill and glad-handing — including recognition of the Jewish delegation by the Assemblée during question period — the mood was different:

There was an almost palpable sense of pessimism and resignation to the fact that at the end of the day, this government is determined to get Quebec to separate, with the odds higher than ever before that it will happen. And the Jewish community doesn't want any part of it.

Tellingly, national unity was not among the issues selected for discussion by the organizer, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q). They fully realized that there was nothing more the almost uniformly federalist Jewish community could say on this particular day that hadn't already been stated on innumerable occasions and will no doubt be stated many times in the future.

Premier Lucien Bouchard broached the subject himself, speaking about sovereignty as if it were inevitable.

But even when issues not directly related to sovereignty were discussed at meetings with six cabinet members — ranging from financial support for Jewish education and social services to the future of Montreal — it was still sovereignty that bubbled beneath the surface. It was the topic participants muttered about among themselves.

The air of pessimism was not helped by a couple of key cabinet members, some of whose utterances betrayed a mindset some members of the delegation simply did not and could not ever share:

• Serge Menard, minister of state for the metropolitan area of Montreal, lauded the city's "ethnic richness" and the Jewish community's contribution to it, but maintained that the sovereigntist cause had little to do with the city's economic decline or departure of youth from the city.

Members of the delegation looked at each other when Menard blamed the city's malaise on the "anglophone media" and accused English Canada of seeking to maintain its "domination" of the French-Quebec nation.

• Andre Boisclair, minister responsible for relations with citizens, distributed a ministry position paper expressing a sincere commitment to fostering tolerance, pluralism and intercultural rapprochement.

Boisclair seemed to speak from the heart in saying that Quebec profitted from its "richness of cultures," lauding the Jewish community's "Caravan of Tolerance" and referring to the community as "partners" contributing to these ideals.

Yet Boisclair bridled when Max

News Analysis

Bernard, chair of CJC-Q community relations committee, challenged him on the issue of multiculturalism, which Boisclair suggested builds barriers between communities and works against the Parti Québécois' goal of building a "culture of convergence."

"The best way to fight racism and intolerance is to encourage [common] participation," Boisclair said. "I don't think we have to support the development and promotion of things that move us away from the concept of being citizens."

Another session, perhaps thankfully, had no undercurrents of sovereignty.

Education Minister Pauline Marois made it clear that in the new age of fiscal responsibility, cuts were on the horizon for Quebec's private schools, which would include those in the Jewish day school system.

Marois also said the move towards linguistic public school boards, which the Jewish community supports, would be proceeding as planned.

But Joe Rabinovitch, former director of the Association of Jewish Day Schools, argued that plans to create Protestant and Catholic "committees" within the boards — in order to keep them constitutional — were unfair.

If a degree of "confessionality" will continue to exist, he maintained, other religious communities should get the same right.

To no one's surprise, the Jewish delegation, during meetings with their federalist confreres in the Liberal "shadow cabinet," found more receptive ears.

Thomas Hecht, representing the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, continued to lobby for a place for Israel among the francophonie nations during a meeting with international affairs critic Fatima Houda-Pepin (and later with Minister Sylvain Simard).

Visit to Montreal

Recently, during one of my regular visits to Montreal, I had the good fortune of meeting Mac Mendelsohn. Mac volunteered to be my guide on a rainy Thursday afternoon, on a tour through part of the fabled, double-centuried Jewish history of the city.

Tall, dignified in bearing and in white-haired good looks, Mac walks with the confident, but not strident, straight-backed posture bred in him by both the regimen of a wartime youth spent in the Royal Canadian Air Force and a deeply positive outlook on life.

He was the perfect tour guide, patient with all my questions and comprehensive in all his answers. Born and raised in Montreal, he knows the streets like a tree knows its own roots. He loves the city even as he loves his Jewish heritage, both of which – the city and his heritage – are woven into a splendid single fabric which he wears proudly on his sleeve and tenderly in his heart like velvet over a precious stone.

As with all pleasant experiences, our time was limited. I wanted to see the city's synagogues. But in the two hours available, it was impossible to see the 40 or more shuls in the greater Montreal area. Thus, Mac wisely selected four which were representative of the community on a number of levels: migration patterns, method of worship and age. Despite this, we had time only for a short stop at each.

We started at Congregation Sépharade Or Hahayim in Cote St. Luc. This was the newest of the congregations we visited. In a uniquely gratifying Jewish irony that could happen only in Montreal or in Israel, the synagogue is located on Einstein Avenue. The building has been recently renovated. Indeed the varnish on the attractive double wooden exterior doors was still fresh to the touch, still sparkling in the daylight, unbeaten by the weather and unfaded by the sun.

Inside we sat in an intimate sanctuary whose colors were fresh and clear, gentle blue and eggshell white. On the eastern wall, above the Aron Kodesh, light poured into the sanctuary through the perfect symmetry and the mathematical beauty of the heavenwardly-pointing arches of the Maghreb.

Next we went to the Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue, very close by, also in Cote St. Luc. In contrast to the North African architectural stylings of Or Hahayim, Beth Israel is distinctively North American. Nestled in an inviting harmony with the green of trees and plants and flowers starting to bloom, its warm, modern brick facade is carried throughout the interior of the synagogue in a modern, informal brick and fabric decorative motif. The sanctuary is quietly direct, self-effacing and contemplative. The mechitzah which immediately denotes the synagogue as Orthodox in its ritual, is modest and moderate, "friendly" to the women who worship from behind it.

We left the suburb of Cote St. Luc to travel back, both in direction and in time, eastward toward the city. We stopped in Westmount at the Temple Emanu-el Beth Sholom. Temple Emanu-el was the third synagogue founded in Montreal, the first Reform congregation in Canada. It dates to 1882.

On entering the sanctuary, one is immediately struck by the enormity of the room and the height and esthetic of the ceiling. The ceiling was fashioned to resemble and replicate a stylized tent covering, creating a meeting place which soars high above, grand, ethereal. The sanctuary is a long, angular auditorium of prayer whose lines of sight converge and culminate in the simple charm and modesty of the bimah and the Aron Kodesh. "How splendid are your tents, O Jacob."

Our last visit was to the Shaar Hashomayim just a few blocks away. This synagogue is presently celebrating its 150th anniversary. It was the second one founded in Montreal after Shearith Israel (which was later to be known as the Spanish and Portuguese Congregation).

It is a stately and elegant structure. The entrance to the sanctuary is marked by hewn limestone, shaped and sculpted in a manner reminiscent of the material and the style which decorate the hallways in the House of Commons in Ottawa. The sanctuary envelops one in a feeling of lofty and magisterial solemnity, an emotional and esthetic result of the combination of lush carpeting, the stark simplicity of the stone walls and the dark, polished wooden furniture, obviously carved by hands that understood the simple inner essence of silent prayer.

I felt deeply grateful to Mac for having set aside this time for me. I also felt privileged to have been able to visit with him, in the relaxed, uncluttered quiet of the afternoon, these four distinct aspects of the rich, varied life of Jewish Montreal.

We left the Shaar Hashomayim, walking briskly to avoid as much of the rain as possible, and mindful of the congestion on the roads that would slow down our drive to the airport. As we approached the car, my thoughts quickly rebounded away from the places of prayer that we had visited, back down to the level of the street where Mac had parked his car. It had been ticketed.

Hard as I tried, Mac wouldn't let me pay.

Time runs out for Adam

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Time has run out for Adam Kruger.

The 9-year-old North York boy, who fought a 2½-year battle with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, died peacefully on Victoria Day at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Stephen Kruger, his father, told The CJN in a broken voice that Adam was buried with his favorite X-Men hat, his wrestling action figures and his pogs.

Before his death, mass screenings were being planned to find a bone marrow donor for him.

A decision was made to go ahead with the screening planned for Cenennial Arena to coincide with last Sunday's UJA walkathon. Media reports estimate between 300 and 500 people flocked to the clinic, which was attended by members of Adam's family. The screening scheduled for May 30 from 1 to 9 p.m. at Beth Tzedec is also still taking place, as did The Night of Hope at Shark City on May 28.

Adam Kruger

The Adam Kruger Memorial Fund has been established at Beth Tzedec Congregation. The family and the synagogue are in the process of determining exactly how the money raised will be allotted.

Characteristic of most of the young cancer patients on Ward 8A at the Hospital for Sick Children, Kruger said, Adam fought hard right to the end. His love of life, his consideration and his caring never left him, his father said.

Maybe that was why there was such a bright sunny day for his funeral.

Adam is survived by his mother, Judy, father Stephen and 5-year-old brother Jason.

Sadat delivers upbeat assessment of peace process

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bombs and bullets can't halt the peace process in the Middle East, says Anwar Sadat's widow, Jehan.

"The enemies of peace on both sides are still trying to stop peace, but they haven't learned that bombs and bullets won't stop it," she declared at a luncheon sponsored by Toronto Hadassah-Wizo and Youth Aliyah.

For the peace process to succeed, Israel and its Arab partners must be prepared to make compromises, she said. "Enough time has been wasted."

In an upbeat speech delivered at the Westin Harbour Castle Hotel, Sadat predicted that Israel and the rest of its Arab neighbors would sign a just and comprehensive peace agreement one day, building on the achievements of her late husband and of Menachem Begin, the deceased prime minister of Israel.

In November 1977, Anwar Sadat, the president of Egypt, became the first Arab leader to set foot on Israeli soil. Less than two years later, in March 1979, he and Begin signed a peace treaty, the first of its kind between Israel and an Arab state.

Warning there are no viable alternatives to peace, Jehan Sadat said the people of the Middle East yearn for it. For too long, she added, violence and bloodshed have wracked the region.

"Let us all forget and forgive the past," she suggested. "Too many children have lost their innocence because of the enmity."

With peace, she prophesied, the countries of the area will finally be able to improve their respective standard of living, concentrate on economic development and create "a new civilization based on honor and good faith."

Sadat credited her husband, assassinated by Islamic fundamentalists in October 1981, for starting the peace process.

Jehan Sadat

"He paved the way for others. He is the one who started it when it was so difficult. He believed that Egypt had sacrificed enough. For peace, he said, a man must do everything in his power."

In an emotional aside, Sadat said she and her husband knew he would be killed after his historic visit to Jerusalem in 1977. "I was torn between encouraging him in his efforts and feeling I was going to lose him. That Sadat died for peace is life's most bitter irony. I miss him very, very much."

Recalling her husband's personal approach to Middle Eastern diplomacy, Sadat said he went to Jerusalem with an open mind and an open heart "in the spirit of Islam."

Islam, she claimed, is a religion based on love, peace and compassion. It abhors violence and considers revenge and blood feuding sinful.

Sadat said the vast majority of Egyptians supported her husband's peaceful overtures toward Israel. She criticized two Egyptian foreign ministers who resigned rather than carry out Sadat's policy. "They lacked the courage to proceed," she observed more in sadness than in anger.

Later, in a brief question-and-answer period, Sadat disclosed that at the 1970 funeral of his predecessor, Gamel Abdel Nasser, her husband informed the American ambassador to Egypt that he was ready for a rapprochement with Israel. However, the U.S. envoy didn't take him seriously.

Sadat, who is half-British and a grandmother 10 times over, recalled that her life with her husband, though full and joyful, was fraught with worry. "We were loving partners, trying to do something for the country."

The recipient of a PhD in Arabic literature, Sadat currently teaches at the University of Maryland. The institution, she revealed, plans to establish a chair in population studies in her husband's memory.

The chair will be inaugurated by Ezer Weizman, the president of Israel, and Jimmy Carter, the former president of the United States and one of the architects of the 1978 Camp David Accords, which led to Israel's peace treaty with Egypt.

Kolel gets $25,000 grant from Federation

TORONTO — Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and the Outreach Department of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism recently received a grant of $25,000 from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's action committee for Jewish continuity for the program, A Taste of Judaism. Are You Curious?

A Taste of Judaism is a free, three-class series for adult beginners, offered as an accessible, brief introduction to the basics of Judaism. Unaffiliated or disconnected Jews are invited to explore a modern, liberal Jewish perspective on various aspects of Judaism. The first of two programs in 1996 is set to begin the first week of June.

It is anticipated that over 150 people will participate in the three consecutive lectures on God, Torah and Israel. Looking at both ancient and modern sources, including the Torah, the classes will touch on a Jewish approach to spirituality, values and peoplehood. The aim is to help participants freely explore what intrigues or confuses them about Judaism, and to speak to contemporary issues.

Classes will be held in five locations in the Greater Toronto Area including Mississauga. Participants register by calling the Taste of Judaism hotline at 905-764-1329. While there is no enrolment fee, space is limited and pre-registration is mandatory.

Kolel is also offering A Taste of Judaism in Hamilton, beginning on May 27. The number to call for Hamilton registration only is 528-0121.

Jews for Judaism opens new HQ in Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Jews for Judaism executive director Julius Ciss (left) and board member David Woolf affix a mezuzah to the organization's new Canadian headquarters. [Stephen Epstein photo]

TORONTO — Right under the Metro Toronto telephone directory listing for "Jews for Jesus" is "Jews for Judaism" — almost as if to say, "Oh yeah?"

The coincidence reflects the kind of bravado that is almost a trademark for Julius Ciss, whose days are spent in an alarmingly growing battle for the Jewish soul. It's almost trench warfare.

As executive director of Jews for Judaism's Canadian operations, Ciss, along with education director Rabbi Michael Skobac, sees his organization as a counter-missionary force designed to thwart what he calls aggressive and deceptive tactics by fundamentalist Christian groups out to convert Jews.

Founded in the United States in 1984, Jews for Judaism recently opened its new Canadian headquarters and Counter-Missionary Centre on Bathurst Street.

Most Jews are familiar with Jews for Jesus, the largest of the groups with which Ciss does battle. Recruiters can be found handing out leaflets urging acceptance of "Y'shua" (Jesus) as the "true Jewish messiah," and often citing Christian scripture blended with Hebrew words, stars of David and Torah scrolls.

Ciss uses different words for it. He says these groups preach a "redecorated Christianity" and exploit Jewish symbols and phrases, especially around holiday times. It's all aimed, he says, specifically at Jews. That's why they celebrate Jewish holidays and worship in "messianic synagogues" with kippah-wearing "rabbis."

Often referred to as messianic Jews, Ciss prefers the term Hebrew-Christians to describe the growing number of those who preach that in order to be a "fulfilled" or "complete" Jew, one must accept Christ as messiah and savior.

In Ontario alone, Ciss estimates there are some 50 organizations fitting the bill, including Jews for Jesus, Chosen People Ministries and individual congregations in Metro, like New Covenant House, Congregation Melech Yisrael and Beth Sar Shalom. New ones pop up all the time.

Over the past 30 years, Ciss told The CJN, these and other groups have become bolder and tougher, engaging in "an intensively driven effort" specifically to target Jews for conversion. The threat is greater now than ever before, he warns, due to sophisticated technology like the Internet.

And these organizations are well-funded. Ciss says the roughly 450 missionary groups in North America have a combined budget of $100 million, often using the money to buy full-page newspaper ads around Jewish holidays.

Ciss is careful to point out that not all Christians proselytize Jews. But those who do tend to be right-wing, fundamentalist or "born again" Protestants for whom the Bible is the inerrant word of God and who are emboldened by the New Testament's dictum to spread the Gospel "to the Jew first and also to the Greek [gentile]."

A 45-year-old artist and illustrator, Ciss speaks from experience. He was a member of Congregation Melech Yisrael for five years before returning to his Jewish roots in 1981. Since his departure from the movement, he's been facing down the missionaries, confronting them on street corners and at meetings, and issuing repeated warnings to the Jewish community.

Jews for Judaism offers direct counselling for family members, day-long seminars and lectures, and what Rabbi Skobac terms "exit counselling" for those seeking to return to Judaism.

Despite the efforts, more Jews have converted to Christianity in the last 19 years than in the last 19 centuries, Ciss states. A shocking survey in the United States a few years ago showed that 12 percent of Jewish-born Americans — about half a million people — accept Jesus as their savior.

In Canada, Ciss estimates that between 1,500 and 2,500 Jews have converted to this form of Christianity over the past 20 years, with up to 750 in Toronto. Especially vulnerable are the elderly, teenagers and Jews from the former Soviet Union, who often arrive with little knowledge of Judaism.

But the entire community is vulnerable, he adds, because of reduced commitment and what he calls "Jewish rootlessness."

In the meantime, the phone at the Jews for Judaism office doesn't stop ringing. "Unfortunately," Ciss sighs, "we're in business."

Jews for Judaism presents its next all-day seminar on June 9 at the North York Public Library. Call 416-789-2851 for details.

Israel's influence on teenagers examined in study

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the eight years since Naava Frank began collecting data for the PhD thesis she has just completed, her subject matter has become one of the foremost issues facing North American Jewry.

At that time only a few isolated studies had been done on the effect of Israel summer programs on Jewish identity in adolescents. The latter has become a hot topic, however, in the face of community concern about Jewish continuity.

Evidence indicates that such trips have more impact during the last two years of high school than they would at a younger age, Frank says.

"Those who were younger were very eager to go back home and fit in. That's not to say they hadn't been influenced by the trip, but my sense is that they were less willing to act differently [by keeping Shabbat, for example]."

Frank's research for her Harvard University paper focused on a Minneapolis-based arts-oriented program called Nesiya, which brings together American and Israeli youth during a six-week stay in Israel.

She cautions that her own study has a narrow focus and cannot be generalized to other Israel programs, but says it provides food for thought that needs to be studied further.

The 35-year-old American is in Toronto for the year with her husband Gregg Stern, the 1995-96 Ray D. Wolfe fellow for the University of Toronto's department of Jewish Studies.

For her thesis, Frank interviewed 20 high school students representing a variety of Jewish backgrounds at the beginning, middle and end of their six-week stay in Israel. About half were interviewed again 10 months after their return home.

She emphasizes that it is important to help students find "aspects of Judaism which are personally meaningful and which they can express outside the family." For youngsters who feel Judaism brings the family together, the religion becomes irrelevant when they're removed from a family situation, as they often are in university, she explains.

Frank believes that pre-trip preparation and post-trip follow-up is very important to make the experience "an integrated event instead of just an isolated one which may not relate to the rest of their lives."

In her research she found that the impact of the trip weakened when the students did not have an outlet to express what they'd learned in Israel.

The students she followed were generally affected in one of three ways:

- The Jewish identity with which they began was strengthened.
- They underwent a noticeable change, becoming more observant or "feeling more Jewish."
- They felt challenged and began to question but didn't resolve any issues.

Aish HaTorah dinner set

TORONTO — Edward Sonshine, chairman of Counsel Corporation, and his wife Fran will be honored for their leadership and commitment to Aish HaTorah, at its annual fundraising dinner.

An Evening of Jewish Pride will be held at 6 p.m. on June 6 at Le Parc.

Aish HaTorah's 1996-1997 fundraising campaign will focus on the Sonshine Jerusalem Fellowship Canadian Campus Project, a special program which seeks to develop the Jewish leaders of tomorrow.

Proceeds from the event will be directed, in part, to support a group of young students between the ages of 19 and 29, who will explore Jewish life and thought in Jerusalem. The fellowship will award 500 scholarships to students from around the world, an increase of more than 50 scholarships over 1995.

Keynote speaker will be Alan Dershowitz, the well-known U.S. lawyer, author and human rights activist.

Canadian author and political commentator David Frum will be dinner speaker.

For tickets, call Aish HaTorah at 905-764-1818, ext. 230.

A source of strength

These words are written 48 hours before the citizens of Israel will vote in their 14th general election, very likely the last in this century and in this millennium.

Forty-eight years after the country was born, the citizens of Israel – and they alone – will stand in the voting booths to choose, from among 21 party lists, the leaders who will take the country into the next stage of the peace process. Despite the claims by many of the smaller parties, the only real issue on which most voters will make their choice is: What will that next stage be?

As of this writing, virtually the eve of the election, the outcome is uncertain.

The race for prime minister is said to be essentially tied, as is the contest for the Knesset. Yediot Aharonot carried a report six days before the election which predicted the left-wing bloc, comprising the current coalition, would win 52 seats and the right-wing bloc of Likud, Moledet and Gesher would win 41 seats. The religious parties would win approximately 15 seats and the two new centrist parties, Israel b'Aliyah and the Third Way, would win eight seats.

Many commentators in Israel have observed that this election has been unlike any in the past. Daniel Ben-Simon wrote the following in Davar Rishon: "I have never encountered such a situation. People I meet tell me, with some pain, that they don't know for whom to vote. It is a strange situation, the likes of which I don't remember in the past. On previous occasions you could feel a few days before the elections how they would end. Today it is virtually impossible. This is the strangest election campaign I have known."

The picture that emerges, therefore, is that of a country ideologically and electorally divided down the middle into two large blocs. Though we cannot predict yet who will be the next prime minister, we can safely say that the distribution of seats in the new Knesset is likely to resemble the distribution in the old one. Thus, Israelis and their supporters around the world are facing a situation in which neither main party will likely win decisively.

Whoever is asked to form the next government will have a difficult task in doing so; and once having done so, in steering a legislative and political agenda through the Knesset. The government and the opposition will form nearly equal halves in a divided whole.

Of course such an outcome will also bear compelling consequences for the Jewish people in the Diaspora. Will we continue to be, as we became, regrettably, after the "handshake" in 1993, an alternate battleground for the parliamentary cut and thrust of Israeli politics?

In the most recent issue of the Jerusalem Report the American writer Anne Roiphe observed that the fallout from the transfer of the Knesset debates to the Diaspora has brought harmful, long-term results for Israel: "It is unlikely after the bitter uncompromising attack on the peace process launched by the American Likud supporters that the Jewish political leadership will ever again be strong enough to silence American Jewish opposition to the elected government in Israel."

The CJN agrees with Roiphe's assessment.

Israeli citizens alone are voting. It is they alone who are electing the leaders who will formulate and execute policy. We pray they will vote from conscience and from conviction. This is, after all, the great democratic exercise, the life-sustaining stream coursing deeply through the bedrock of the country's foundation, one of the sources of its great moral strength and of the soaring pride we all feel for this small, astonishing country.

Our love of Israel is not less when we say it is for them – the citizens of Israel – to vote, and for us – the people of Israel – to lend the result honor and respect.

Slow learner denied access to Jewish schools

My son and many other children like him are being denied entry to the Jewish schools. He is in the category of a slow learner, which means he needs extra support in order to learn what an average child might pick up easily. Does this mean that he should be denied a Jewish education? Does the posuk Torah Tzva lonu not apply to him? I am forced to send him half a day to public school and they have accepted him with open arms, whereas none of the Jewish day schools are willing or able to help him.

The schools claim that they do not have funding to initiate such a project. In reality, the school Zareinu, which has been a great help to my child, has approached most of the Jewish day schools and offered them a teacher and support. It would not have cost a penny. All they had to do was provide a classroom. None of the schools agreed to this.

One notable exception is Shearim, who would be willing to help, except that their expertise is in teaching children with learning disabilities.

I cannot afford a private tutor. In fact most people cannot! Is not the right to a Jewish education open to all Jewish children? Apparently not. My son and others like him are excluded.

I ask the rabbis, principals, school board members, educators and parents to please open your hearts to the many children being denied their Jewish heritage and their G-d given right to a Jewish education.

Deny covenant is a hoax

We read with considerable dismay the letter of May 10 by Joseph Winter saying that the Palestine National Council (PNC) covenant change is a hoax. The facts are quite clear. The PNC voted that "The Palestinian National Charter is hereby amended by cancelling the articles that are contrary to the letters exchanged between the PLO and the Government of Israel 9-10 September, 1993." Those clauses which called for the destruction of Israel are now null and void.

This action, which was passed by an overwhelming vote of 504-54 heralds a transformation in the relationship between Israel and the Palestinians. That is what they had agreed to do, and they did it — case closed.

Yes, the PNC will be drafting a new charter, but surely this is only obvious, since the previous charter has been so dramatically stripped down. Sometimes one has to take Yes for an answer and get on with the difficult negotiations ahead.

No floor of $50,000 on UIA bequests

Your May 16 issue carried a report based on an interview with Shlomo Pollack of Keren Hayesod UIA and Barney Harris of the United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada, headlined, "UIA launches campaign to line up bequests." There are a few misperceptions I would like to clarify.

The headline itself is somewhat misleading. While bequests are a cornerstone of our Endowment Fund, there are a number of other planned giving opportunities for a donor to consider, such as a gift of life insurance, a charitable gift annuity, a gift of securities or property and a charitable remainder trust. UIA is vitally concerned that our contributors be made aware of all these possibilities.

In the next 20 years it is speculated that a trillion dollars will be transferred in Canada from one generation to another — not from "one Jewish generation to another," as the report contends. If only it were so ...

In the United States, according to the Council of Jewish Federations, only 1,000 of the 55,000 Jews who died in 1993 made a charitable contribution to their federation — not, as stated in your report, "to Israel."

The prospects whom UIA will approach are by no means confined to those who can bequeath $50,000 or more, as asserted in the report. Ours is a people's organization which draws its support from all income levels and is, at its essence, a manifestation of tzedakah from the whole House of Israel.

'Terror in the name of God'

I read with interest the article (May 9) about Simma Holt, author of Terror in the Name of God. She outlined the history of the Doukhobors of the Kootenay Valley in British Columbia. I read of their fanatical leaders and the terrorism inflicted upon the community in the name of religion by the trusting but naive adherents to the sect. Bombings, burnings and murders were given religious justification.

The terrorist acts of the Hamas, the Hezbollah, the Goldsteins, the Amirs and their confederates are all adherents of this crazy notion of "Terror in the Name of God."

Will we ever learn that we worship a G-d of justice and compassion, not one of terror.

Jews profoundly affected modern thought

By HAROLD SHAPIRO

A reverence for text and ongoing interpretation

One of the great and distinguishing characteristics of modern times has been the organized and systematic pursuit of new knowledge and understanding (i.e., secular learning). Over the past two or three centuries, scholars have looked everywhere, from modern science to ancient texts, in an effort to better grasp the nature, meaning and potential of our life together on this planet. Many leading thinkers in this modern period — from archeology and biblical studies, to politics, to medicine, to physics and beyond — have come from the Jewish community. Indeed, given the small size of the Jewish community, the contributions of Jewish scholars and educators to modern scholarship is quite astonishing.

Certainly, thinkers like Karl Marx, Sigmund Freud and Albert Einstein have so profoundly affected the nature of modern thought that we can hardly separate their theorizing from our contemporary understanding of scholarship and education. The focus of my remarks, however, will be on somewhat earlier Jewish traditions in education and scholarship.

I want to turn our attention to the impact of ancient Jewish educational ideas, commitments and approaches, and to the contribution of earlier Jewish scholars on the development of modern western scholarship, educational ideals and practices.

It is especially interesting for us to consider what was happening to Jewish education and scholarship when the scholars of ancient Greece were beginning to lay the foundation of modern thought and civilization in the fifth century BCE. It is interesting to note that this flowering of classical civilization coincides — quite closely — with the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, as the Second Temple was being rebuilt and the return from the Babylonian exile had occurred. It was in this period that the Pentateuch was written down in more or less its current form and the public reciting of the Torah began. In other words, in Jewish life, as in Hellenic life, the oral tradition which would eventually culminate in the Midrash and the Talmud was beginning to be replaced.

Some centuries later, as the Roman scholars were articulating the idea of the Seven Liberal Arts, Jewish scholars (after the destruction of the Second Temple) were developing the liturgy we continue to honor and — even more important — translating the Bible into both Greek and Aramaic and developing the Talmud and the bulk of the complex set of ideas and commandments known as the Halachah (the "right" road). It is fair to say, therefore, that just as much of the classical foundation of Western civilization was put in place in the 1,000 years between 500 BCE and 500 CE, so too were the basic tenets of the Judaism we practise today.

It was, of course, also in this period that the Hellenization of the Middle East occurred and — especially after the destruction of the Second Temple — that the Jewish Diaspora took place. Both of these developments brought Jewish scholars into direct contact with different world views and were to have a profound influence — in later years — on the evolution of Western scholarship. For the moment, however, I want to concentrate on some of the early traditions of Jewish education.

The wisdom tradition of Scripture is deeply ambivalent about the value of learning — an ambivalence grounded, I believe, in uncertainty about what is meant by learning. Is it the development of new knowledge or the acquisition of traditional and even sacred wisdom, values and virtues? Is it understanding the meaning of the Lord's word(s) or is it a broader understanding of the natural world we inhabit, developed perhaps independently of the revered and sacred texts? This tension between the status of sacred versus non-sacred sources of wisdom and understanding remains with us to this day.

There can be little doubt, however, that for the early Jewish communities, education was very important — and it focused on how one might live a holy life. This stood in some contrast to many of the branches of Hellenic education (concerned, at least in part, with the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake) or to Roman education (aimed at the development of citizens to lead the state). Jewish education in this early period focused in a primary way on the formation of the individual's character — understood, in a religious sense, as the understanding and observance of the Law of Torah. Its aim, in a very real sense, is not the well-honed intellect but the well-lived life.

This was well summarized by Rabbi Akiva, who, when he was asked, "Which is greater, study or doing?" answered, "Study ... for study leads to doing."

Similarly, listen to the words of the Jewish historian Josephus on the importance and purpose of education: "Our principal care of all is this, to educate our children well; and we think it to be the most necessary business of our whole life to observe the laws that have been given us, and to keep those rules of piety that have been delivered down to us."

In fact, the claim has been made that what is most distinctive about early Jewish educational practice is its unfailing focus on the moral conduct of life. It would not have occurred to early Jewish educational thinkers, or most other scholars from the ancient societies, to ask — as the New York Times did recently — "Can schools teach character?" The whole point of education and study was to refine one's character to be as close as possible to the ethical precepts laid out in the Torah.

Although the emphasis on the moral component of life as the true end of education is not unique to the Jews, what is distinctive is the non-secular aspect of this educational understanding and its thorough integration with the full spectrum of the society's practices. While the Greco-Roman philosophies might present competing paradigms of the moral life, Jewish understanding remained unified, solidly grounded in a shared text, focused on all aspects of life, and to that extent, perhaps capable of sustaining fuller elaboration.

Perhaps the next most oft-cited characterization of the education of Jewish people is that they are "a people of the Book." In modern times, this has often been used to describe the great commitment of many Jewish communities to education of all kinds — both sacred and secular. We should remember, however, that the deepest Jewish educational traditions focus on the Book — the Five Books of Moses — and its meaning for the conduct of our lives both individually and as a community. Indeed, the centrality of the Scripture defines Jewish education. It is hardly too much to say that for most of our history, Jewish education is Torah. This absolute focus upon an individual text as embodying and containing society's most important knowledge does in some ways distinguish the Jews from, for example, their Greek contemporaries — but, again, not quite as clearly as we might be tempted to believe.

While education based on the centrality of a single text is not unique in antiquity, the sacral quality of the Jewish belief does render it distinctive. So too, the accompanying emphasis not only on knowing but also on putting into practice the ethical precepts of the text surpasses the claims that most such revered texts make upon a society's members. It would hardly be too much to say that, in traditional Jewish belief, the goal of life consists in living in conformity with our understanding of the text.

Although the words of the Torah provide the foundation for all traditional Jewish learning, rabbinical scholarship has become an intricate part of the resulting edifice; and at the base of all rabbinical learning and education was one of the most astounding works of scholarship ever developed — the Talmud. The complex and fascinating form which the elaboration of and commentary on Jewish law takes — the oral Halachah and Hagadah and ultimately, the written Talmud — has been increasingly recognized by modern scholars as extremely influential on the subsequent traditions of Western practices of reading and of critical thinking itself. The development of the Talmud is a unique story in some ways, although it also shows some affinities with a broader process in Western scholarship that, in this historical era (after the destruction of the Second Temple), generated extensive Homeric and Vergilian commentaries or the exhaustive treatment of the intricacies of Roman law, collected in the Justinian and other digests.

Yet, both the form and the content of the Talmud present striking scholarly innovations. Let me deal with its innovative form, since others are more learned than I in its content. First, we have the establishment of a then quite novel tradition of attributing particular comments to particular scholars — whether they be Rashi, Rashi's pupils, Maimonides or Caro — who over the years had developed insights into the holy Scripture itself, the Mishnah and the Gemara. This is in marked contrast to the Greco-Roman practice of simply noting without attribution: "It has been said." Moreover, the form of the Talmud — the structure of each page — could be considered the first modern "information retrieval system"! It set new standards for the scholarly analysis and presentation of revered and sacred texts.

In addition, we can identify some characteristic modes in which the transmission of early Jewish instruction took place. Clearly, for example, memorization was considered fundamental to training — as we might expect, given the importance of transmitting the oral tradition of the law. Mnemonic devices of various kinds abound in rabbinic texts. To aid in memorization, repetition was considered essential, and repetition with a singsong intonation was an important means of facilitating memorization, so that Rabbi Akiva refers to the daily study of the Torah as "a song each day."

Moreover, a very striking characteristic of traditional Jewish education is that it is a lifelong endeavor, since the study of the Torah is enjoined upon the Jewish male every day of his life. "Jewish education," it has been said, "was as endless and as intricate and as subtle as life itself." (One way in which this was practised in the Babylonian academies was the institution of kallah — two months during the year when those who were not normally full-time students would come from all parts of the Diaspora to study texts together.) While the obligation to deepen one's understanding of Torah might be fulfilled simply by private reading, it might also lead to continued attendance in the institutions of higher instruction — a concept of "continuing education" which we are only now reinventing.

Of course, the liturgy of the synagogue, involving as it did the reading and exposition of the law, also provided in a sense ongoing "adult education" and has been called "the first school for adults or popular university." As the practice evolved which resulted in the entire Pentateuch being completed annually in the Sabbath readings, not only young and old but also male and female were instructed in the contents of Scripture.

Within Jewish tradition, the reverence developed for the text and the value accorded its ongoing interpretation and reinterpretation — had a tremendous intellectual significance for posterity. One scholar has even, not implausibly, identified "the interpretation and rewriting of sacred texts" as "the most characteristic feature of the Jewish imagination." In any case, it certainly had a great influence on the development of the tools of scholarly investigation and understanding.

Why all this onesidedness?

By Emil Fackenheim

My last letter was about the Sharm al Sheikh anti-terror summit, deliberately written before the event. Now I am writing about the elections, prior to them, but deliberately so that my reflections will appear the day after it is all over. I am not electioneering.

I missed the previous deadline because I was on a speaking tour which took me to Chicago, New York and Eugene, Ore. I was also in Bloomington, Ind., and Toronto. And nowhere did the papers or journals have a good word — indeed, hardly any word at all — to say about the Likud. It was simply Shimon Peres for peace and Benjamin Netanyahu against it. As if the peace process were peace, and as if criticism of the present approach to peace were hostility to peace itself!

To be sure, the respected Herald Tribune carried a picture of Netanyahu, in the same issue that it had Tom Friedman's piece to the effect that a Likud victory would be a disaster, but there was not a single word by Netanyahu, and the picture itself was of him huddling with bearded, black-hatted rabbis. Get it? Those fundamentalist Jewish fanatics again! And the even more respected New York Review of Books had a long review of Peres' Memoirs by Avishai Margalit, a Hebrew University philosophy professor, in which the latter managed a remarkable feat. He did not mention either that it was Likud that made the first peace with an Arab country, or that it was Labor that almost got the country into disaster in the Yom Kippur War. True, Peres was not at the helm then, but evidently not all virtues for peace and war belong to Labor.

Is there a lesson for us in the fact that it needed Charles de Gaulle to extricate France from Algeria? Probably not, for Algeria never wanted to destroy France. But is there a lesson for us in the fact that it took Menachem Begin to make peace with Egypt? I am not sure, for peace with Egypt was one thing, peace with the PLO is another.

But that is just my point. I am not sure and — I maintain — neither is it possible for anyone else to be sure. Then why all this onesidedness? By the time these lines appear, the die will have been cast. But whatever it is, the peace to come — if come it does — will be neither genuine nor lasting unless Israel's vital interests remain untouched.

Uncertainty dominates Likud coalition

By Chaim Herzog

It has been my privilege to participate in every election since the establishment of the State of Israel.

Indeed, on a difficult and violent occasion in 1981, I headed the information campaign for the Labor Alignment, which succeeded in converting 32 seats in the Knesset to 47 seats. Nevertheless, Labor failed to create a government.

There has never been, however, an election campaign in which the voter faced so vital and unambiguous an issue as in these elections. And yet in no campaign can I remember the debate being so uninspiring. Some central parties have gone so far as to ignore the main issues facing the country.

The Likud has adopted a policy of repeating daily, on every occasion, conclusions about the other side's policy, without proving anything and despite the assertion by the opposing party the conclusions are untrue.

There has, indeed, been a general policy of repeating slogans that lack any basis, on the assumption that by dint of repetition they will sink into the public's consciousness.

The political struggle has not been a serious one. Slogans are slogans and nothing more; they cannot replace policies and facts, and it is regrettable that the debate has been dragged down to this level without any real comprehensive debate on the issues.

Labor has presented a detailed plan, which points clearly to the direction in which we are moving, indicating the possible results and stating the price.

And the opposition? It has revealed that the public sincerely desires peace and has come up with a slogan promising Peace with Security.

I can think of no similar example in the history of politics where a slogan like Peace with Security is presented to the public without anyone taking the trouble to explain how it can be achieved. There is simply no argument to base it on, and it is common knowledge that the Likud, unlike Labor, has never seriously debated the issue.

Nobody can point to an internal debate of any standing or significance by the right wing, despite the fact that we are talking about our future in this country.

On the one hand, there is a peace plan now being implemented which has already given Israel special standing in the Middle East and, indeed, throughout the world.

Nothing emphasized this special standing better than the funeral of Yitzhak Rabin, which highlighted the achievements of Rabin and Shimon Peres both in the Middle East and on an international scale.

With this policy, we know what we have achieved and in which direction we are moving, with the additional safety valve of a national referendum regarding both the negotiations with the Palestinians and the issue of the Golan Heights.

On the other side, all we hear is the Peace with Security slogan. And all one knows is that the Likud has no intention of continuing the peace process as promulgated by the Labor party.

Surely the nation deserves to know more. Are we planning to send our troops back into Gaza and the West Bank towns or not? Are we returning to the tragedy of the intifadah? Will our soldiers be condemned to patrolling the casbah in Nablus?

Are we going to expand the security zone in Lebanon to the banks of the River Litani, as proposed by Rafael Eitan only recently? Will the Likud talk to Arafat? Will the national priorities return to those of '92?

The only element on the right that is truly unambiguous is Moledet. All the rest have cloaked themselves in vagueness and hidden behind baseless slogans.

The choice facing the voter is clear cut. It lies between supporting a policy which has already brought peace with Jordan and a partial peace with the Palestinians, with every intention of proceeding in the same direction, or opting for a political coalition dominated by uncertainty and very unclear as to its policy.

The nation has to decide on a prime minister. Labor, which has made great strides toward peace, is led by a man to whose qualities I can testify from close cooperation over a period of 50 years.

Shimon Peres has done more than any other leader, apart from his teacher and mentor David Ben-Gurion, to develop and guarantee our technical and military strength and power of deterrence.

He is faced by a loose and unhappy coalition, the different components of which pull in various directions while its leaders endeavor to become "men for all seasons."

I believe that national common sense will prevail.

Goldhagen's thesis

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

By this time, many of you will have read about Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's book, Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust. The book is about to be published in Germany where, even prior to its appearance, it has raised a storm of controversy.

The reason is clear: Goldhagen indicts not only the Nazis and their devilish leadership but Germany as a whole. Its culture and history, he holds, pointed to the eventual elimination of the Jews which made it unique in history. I have some personal memories that relate to Goldhagen's thesis.

I was almost 23 years old when I left the country. I finished law school and thus had a complete educational experience in the land of my birth. During the Nazi days, life was of course dreadful, but even before — during the years of my growing up, especially in high school — I remember anti-Semitism as a constant presence. Some of my teachers regularly delivered themselves of thinly-veiled anti-Semitic remarks which the five of us Jewish students in the class understood all too well.

I was the youngest in my class and smaller than most of the other students. A big burly fellow sat directly in front of me. His name was Schulz, and every morning when the bell for the big intermission rang and the teacher had left the room, he turned around, smacked me in the face and said, "This is for you, kike." In retrospect, I wonder why no one ever tried to stop Schultz, or why I never reported it to the front office.

I also remember something else, and it has to do with my home and family. Both paternal and maternal branches had lived in Germany for more than 400 to 500 years; my father had served as a soldier during World War I (fortunately at home only), and that same war claimed two of my uncles' lives. One might think that our long residence in the country and our family's participation in the national enterprise of war would have created in all of us a sense of "Germanness." No such thing: I never heard my father or mother use the expression, "We Germans." We were "Jews in Germany," but not part of its core.

After hundreds of years in the country, we were still an excluded minority. However successful many Jews were in the arts and in business, we were not part of the people, and it wasn't just because we chose not to be. They would not have us. In the 23 years of my life in the country, I never knew a single non-Jew socially and never visited a non-Jewish home.

The Goldhagen thesis claims further that not only was German anti-Semitism pervasive, but that by its virulence it made the elimination of Jews acceptable, if not desirable. The soil was sown for the Holocaust, he says, and it happened in Germany and nowhere else. But this construction underplays other factors that had a major role in its happening: tyranny and war.

Fortunately, the new Germany, despite its occasional xenophobic excesses, has a different flavor and I am confident that it will stay that way.

The Kirshner File

Christian Coalition increases its influence

You're going to have a big, big say about what happens in 1996," prophesied Senator Bob Dole last September

By Sheldon Kirshner

at the Christian Coalition's annual convention in Washington.

Since then, events have proven him right. The Christian Coalition, often described as the most influential grassroots movement in American politics today, has had a decisive impact on the Republican party's presidential nomination process.

Less than a year ago, Dole was just another high-powered politician aspiring to be the Republican standard-bearer who would face President Bill Clinton — the Democratic incumbent — in the November election.

Today, thanks to the Christian Coalition's clout with socially conservative voters during the primary season, Dole is the GOP contender, having outdistanced challengers like Phil Gramm, Lamar Alexander and Patrick Buchanan.

The Christian Coalition — founded by Pat Robertson after his unsuccessful 1988 bid to win the Republican nomination — exerted such influence because religious conservatives represent almost one-third of GOP voters and thus form the largest bloc in the party.

The rise to prominence of the Christian Coalition, the vaguard of the religious right in America, is a development of the utmost concern to the majority of Jews in the United States.

The Christian Coalition, with about 1.5 million members, is vociferously and undeniably pro-Israel. But its socio-political agenda, unveiled in May 1995, has been characterized by most Jewish organizations as an assault on tolerance and pluralism.

Meanwhile, two books written by Robertson in the past six years have drawn sharp criticism. In The New Millennium, Robertson suggested that a cabal of liberal and secular Jews have undermined "the public strength of Christianity." And in The New World Order, he knowingly or unknowingly disseminated long discredited anti-Semitic conspiracy theories.

A savvy businessman who has a controlling interest in Standard News, NorthStar Entertainment and The Family Channel, Robertson vehemently denies accusations of anti-Semitism. In letters to The New York Times and in an article published in The Jerusalem Report, he claims that he rejects conspiracy theories and says that he has never intentionally used anti-Semitic code words. Furthermore, Robertson boasts of his support for Israel and points out that he has contributed generously to the United Jewish Appeal and has consistently been "one of the most reliable allies of the Jewish people and the state of Israel."

Why, then, do so many Jews regard Robertson and the Christian Coalition with suspicion and distaste?

Two years ago, the Anti-Defamation League published a booklet accusing the Christian Coalition of promoting intolerance and attempting to breach the constitutional wall between church and state.

Robertson believes that Christianity in America during the past few decades has been subverted by "secular humanism," a catch-all phrase for liberal politicians and educators, the media, Hollywood, gay and lesbian rights advocacy groups, the United Nations, the American Civil Liberties Union, Planned Parenthood and the National Organization for Women.

In his view, American society is in a state of moral decay because the historic influence of Christianity has been eroded. "The centres of power in our culture ... are firmly in the hands of secular humanists who are exerting every effort to debase and eliminate Bible-based Christianity from our society," he has observed.

In its official plank, entitled Contract With the American Family, the Christian Coalition implies that harmful societal influences can be combated with a vigorous program of prayer in schools, drastic limits on abortions and transfers of federal funds to religious schools.

These ideas are anything but alien or repulsive to politically conservative and religiously Orthodox Jews, a distinct minority within the Jewish community. Sensing this, the Christian Coalition, whose first Washington legislative director was a Jew, has welcomed Jewish involvement in its activities.

Few are likely to accept the invitation, if only because Robertson and his institutions have been linked to missionary work.

At a prayer meeting once, Robertson reportedly stated that Jews are spiritually deaf and blind, intimating that repentance can be achieved through conversion. And on Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network, a succession of missionaries and Jewish converts to Christianity have appeared on such programs as Israel and Prophecy, Zola Levitt Live and Bob Friedman and Friends, according to a report in The Forward.

In an attempt to assuage Jewish concerns, the Christian Coalition, guided by its media-wise executive director Ralph Reed, has adopted a moderate, fence-mending tone of late.

Pat Robertson during his 1988 presidential bid.

Last year, for instance, Reed apologized for past insensitivities to Jews and promised to expunge evangelical references to the United States as a "Christian nation."

Even if the Christian Coalition makes good on these pledges, the fact remains that Robertson has not repudiated The New World Order or The New Millennium, which are permeated with anti-Semitic insinuations.

In a rigorously argued essay in The New York Review last year, Michael Lind analyzed both books and reached the conclusion that Robertson's theories about Jewish bankers and Jewish revolutionaries are central to his warped conspiritorial perspective.

As Lind put it: "Not since Father (Charles) Coughlin or Henry Ford has a prominent white American so boldly and unapologetically blamed the disasters of modern world history on the machinations of international high finance in general and on a few influential Jews in particular."

In light of Robertson's convoluted and potentially divisive theories, one cannot but wonder whether the Christian Coalition will grow still more powerful should Dole defeat Clinton and assume the office of the presidency.

At this point, therefore, I think it is legitimate to ask if Dole is beholden to the Christian Coalition. Given Dole's debt of gratitude to Robertson and Reed for supporting him in the primaries, this is hardly an idle question, now or in the future.

Building a community

By RABBI RON AIGEN

What possible connection could be found in the various topics of this week's Torah portion, Naso, including a census-taking of the Levites, a law of quarantine, a trial by ordeal for the suspected adultress, a regimen for the eccentric and a litany of the gifts brought by each of the 12 tribes for the dedication of the Tabernacle? One thread which seems to weave together these disparate episodes is a lesson on community-building.

We learn from the census-taking who it is that receives status in the Jewish world — the ones who carry the Torah, those, as it were, who carry on the teaching of holiness. From the episode on the quarantine, we learn that there are times when some members must be removed from the community.

From the ordeal of the suspected adultress, the sotah, we learn of the irrational emotions which corrode the possibility of true community — suspicion, jealousy and rumors. The antidote to such assaults on intimate relationships, however, is not to revert to a form of religious extremism. From the next episode relating the law of the nazir, we learn that although religious asceticism is tolerated, the religious eccentric must offer a sin offering at the end of the term of asceticism. As the rabbis asked, "Are the normal restrictions of Jewish religion not enough that you need to make them more severe?"

The idea of a public ordeal as a means of dealing with sexual morality or entering into a regime of puritanical asceticism may seem somewhat primitive. But the question of how we deal with our passions, which is addressed in these two episodes of Numbers 5 and 6 is an important one. Although the biblical ordeal of the sotah is careful to identify God as the one who reveals guilt or innocence and not the magic potion of incantation, we are still left wondering how such an ordeal could actually be effective.

We are given a clue in the Talmud, which reports that this ordeal was abolished by Rav Johanan ben Zakkai prior to the destruction of the Temple because sexual immorality was then so rampant that the ordeal of the sotah was no longer effective. We can conclude that this ordeal, like all rituals, can only be effective for those individuals who are willing to take it seriously.

In the final portion of Naso (Numbers 7), we have the presentation of gifts to the Temple by the 12 tribes, each tribe presenting the exact same gift, repeated 12 times in precisely the same words. A better proof text that a religious community demands conformity could not be found. And yet in the previous chapter we read of the episode which legitimates the institution of the nazir, the religious eccentric.

This tension between the needs of individuals and the demands of community life is a major issue for all of us today. One midrash (rabbinic legend) helps resolve the dilemma somewhat by suggesting that what we perceive to be uniformity of practice on the part of the 12 tribes is to be understood as a statement of unity of spirit and purpose.

One path to such a unity of spirit might be found in the priestly benediction, the brief interlude which connects these two episodes of the eccentric and the conforming community.

For the sake of peace we should focus our energies as a people upon the blessings that are uniquely ours both individually and collectively. Rather than being angry when others do not conform to our views and particular forms of self-expression, we should seek to strengthen the blessings that are ours. Knowing that each one of us counts in making up the community and that our primary task is to discipline our passions in just and ethical ways, we should celebrate the rich diversity of all our forms of self-expression in order to extend our blessings to all peoples.

Thank you, Erma Bombeck

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN
Special to The CJN

When I began writing a family humor column for Jewish newspapers across the country, many people asked me if I could sustain it. They asked if I had enough ideas and enough time. But nobody said that family life, the circle of domesticity, wasn't funny or important enough to be column fodder. Why didn't they? Because of the late, wonderful Erma Bombeck.

Her short, sweet, hysterically funny essays about life at home proved that this genre could matter; they proved that this genre existed.

Thanks to her, it will continue to exist. All of us who generally offer smiles are saddened by her death in April in San Francisco.

She had an enviable gift. She carved the way for many of us who followed her, as humorists, as writers, as women in journalism. And yet her job description was simple. She said her son summed it up when he told his whole school bus that she was a "syndicated communist."

She tossed out gems like that, paragraph by paragraph, zingers other people would have built an entire column around, like the one about how she does so little cooking that her kids send Mother's Day cards to Col. Sanders. Once, she noted that throwing a spontaneous, impromptu party takes about three to four weeks, and requires making the house look as if "it has never been lived in by children." But her three children lived in her house, in her work, in all of our lives because of her vivid ability to share.

The Bombeck column on my mind appears in her book Motherhood: The Second Oldest Profession. In this essay, Bombeck creates a mother who dies and leaves an individual, long loving letter for each of her three sons, telling each boy in detail why and how he was important in her life.

The first letter starts, "Since this letter is for no one's eyes but yours, I can tell you that I always loved you best." The second letter begins, "You must have suspected, but I will say it anyway. I have always loved you best." And the third letter says, "A mother is not supposed to have favorites, but I have always loved you best." The letters show the mom's insight about each of her sons. The narrative describes the impact each letter has on the boys, including the middle son, who had been left to watch the house one weekend:

When the mother got back, she asked him, "I want to tell me what happened?"

"What makes you think anything happened," he asked.

"The 30 neighbors standing around in their night clothes watching three police cruisers parked on our front lawn and the dog that is wearing my underwear. A lucky guess."

"I had a party."

"According to the police report you had a 746."

"What's a 746?"

"I'll read it to you. 'Blocking off street for a parade without permission. Illegal parking of two Porta-Johns on a carport, holding an assistant principal against his will, and unlawful assembly of 150 people in a house built as a single-family dwelling'."

Why had he been so stupid? All he had to say was "I'm sorry" and she'd have forgiven him, but he couldn't say it. Now, he'd never get the chance. He felt the letter. It was still there. How could she have known him so well?

The column ends at the mother's funeral, with the description of a woman there who, gossiping with a friend, says, "I heard the medical bills took all they had. She didn't leave those boys a thing."

Like many of Bombeck's columns, this one made me laugh and it made me cry. She left us so much. She knew us so well.

Morality essential in business

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

A story is told that a shochet approached Rabbi Yisroel Salanter (19th century Lithuania) and told him that since he was afraid of inadvertently causing others to eat non-kosher food, he was planning to quit and enter the business world. Upon hearing this, Rabbi Salanter exclaimed, "If you're that concerned about religious pitfalls, it would be much safer to remain a shochet than to be a businessman."

The Halachah and Business

While being a truly morally observant businessman is difficult, its primacy in Jewish thought is reflected by the fact that the Talmud tells us that the first question we will be asked when we meet our maker after 120 years is whether we were honest in our business dealings. We see that the rabbis of the Talmud viewed the hallmark of an observant Jew as first and foremost his ethical behavior, especially as it related to making a living, and that the practice of the "religious" aspects of being a Jew were of "secondary" importance.

Amongst the myriad of ethical and moral issues that one is confronted with in the business world is the prohibition of Lifnei iver lo titen michshol — one must not place a stumbling block before a blind person. The rabbis understood this verse to refer to the offering of advice given in bad faith to an uninformed or "blind" recipient. The determining factor is not whether the advice turns out to be detrimental, nor even whether the advice is actually followed, but whether it was given in good faith. As good faith is not independently verifiable by outsiders, one will only observe this dictum if one is truly a G-d fearing individual.

Professional advisors must therefore be careful when advising clients, especially when they have private interests which even subconsciously can influence the advice they give. Selling a risky mutual fund to a person whom you know to be a conservative investor, in order to gain higher commissions, would be a clear violation of this prohibition. Even when selling a conservative fund, the broker's motivation must be the best interest of the client and not, for example, the potential of earning a trip for having sold the necessary "quota." It would therefore appear incumbent on professional advisors to make full disclosure of all the facts, to allow clients to make an informed decision.

Another aspect of "Lifnei iver" is the prohibition against aiding and abetting the morally blind by becoming a partner in perpetrating a moral infraction. While applicable in all areas of Jewish law, this problem has particular relevance in a business setting. For example it is axiomatic that one may not cheat on one's taxes, whether by sins of omission (i.e., not declaring income), or sins of commission (smuggling undeclared goods across the border). Helping someone else to cheat on their taxes would be a violation of Lifnei iver, for example by shopping in a store or dealing with a contractor when you know taxes will not be paid on your purchase.

This prohibition is not limited to decisions taken by individuals, but also applies to decisions taken by governments or corporations that may hinder the fostering of a proper social, moral or security climate. This forms the basis for government regulation in such diverse areas as liquor consumption, safety standards, highway speed limits to ensure public welfare.

Some fine poetry

Blind Messiah, by Shel Krakofsky (General Distributers, $11.95).

Altar Of The Seasons, by Judah A. Denburg (Mosaic Press, no price ind.).

The Song Of Moses & Other Poems, by Seymour Mayne (Concertina, $6).

Here are some definitions of poetry that I like:

- It is the impish attempt to paint the color of the mind.
- It is the music of thought conveyed to us in the music of language.
- It is the attempt of a sea animal living on land, wanting to fly in the air.

Although hard to write and hard to read, it is heartening that fine poetry is being written and thoughtful readers are available and appreciative. The three slender volumes under review have important things to say and teach about human concerns and Jewish values.

The poems of Shel Krakofsky are accessible, pithy, honest, ironic and playful; a few are visually experimental. His wide-ranging themes consider the paradoxes of Jewish and non-Jewish society and are deftly composed.

In To An Ailing Friend the poet offers limited consolation. "Why me? You ask/Why not you? sweet friend/ you'll not reverse the trend/ many are not blessed/ with the miracle of birth/ the living all cursed/ with the miracle of death."

City Farewell presents a familiar scene to anyone who has seen children off to camp, "they lug duffle bags bulging/with more than their ancestors/ packed on boats for entire lives/ as they catch coordinated buses/ for a month or two in Muskoka/ leaving friends behind from/ plainer houses to fight for/ summer jobs in city heat/ they board, reminded only/ to change underwear/ and to write regularly/ a few European grandparents/ on hand to wave and remember/ other synagogue courtyards/ where good byes were exchanged/ forever."

The poems of Judah Denburg — sensuous, thoughtful and sinewy, were written in many places — Rhodes, Naples, Israel, Copenhagen, Geneva. They embody distilled wisdom and summon up a strong sense of time and place.

In The Law of Kaddish, the poet asserts, "the reason we must say it together/is that we all need/ each other's pain/ to be transformed/ across desolate hallways/ and above the din/ of wasted prayer/ into a beam of beauty:/ exaltation of sources/ of shared destiny,/ setting sail/ against bitter winds/ of death sweeping swirling/ around our souls."

Nineveh offers a melange of sensuous recollections. "A slurry of red wine, blotted sun,/ and feather ripple of marina water —/ colors in a palate/ of provencal sauces/ evaporate into thin october light,/ oblivious of fanatical/ mediterranean shadows/ demanding my exit/ out of the whalebelly solitude/ of a riviera lunch."

The Song of Moses and Other Poems by Seymour Mayne is a collection of short, poetic narrations by familiar biblical personalities. In Covenant, Noah laments, "Who could believe it?/ No rainbow, no/ break of color, no/ sign? Someone's forgotten,/ we reasoned./ And we began to pray/ for the cleaning rains again/ and the waves rising/ to wash our cities —/ friend's and foe's alike —/ with the green tow of return."

Krakofsky and Denburg are physicians in London and Hamilton respectively. Mayne is an Ottawa university professor.

Together they strive, with considerable success, to change our body temperature. For, as Emily Dickenson wrote, "If it makes my whole body so cold that nobody can warm me, I know that's poetry."

Teen honored

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Naomi Davids, 17, has a special relationship with a resident of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care whom she visits once a week as a volunteer.

"We just visit. We talk. I show her pictures. If it's nice, I take her outside for a walk. Sometimes I walk into her room and she's sad or she's crying, and when I leave she gives me a big smile. It makes me feel like I've done something," says Davids, a final-year student at Ulpanat Orot.

The City of North York recently recognized Davids as an outstanding volunteer by awarding her one of this year's 14 Volunteer of the Year Awards.

Naomi Davids

Since 1991, Davids has put in over 1,000 hours as a volunteer. She began volunteering at Baycrest the summer she turned 13, at the suggestion of a friend.

"I loved it," Davids recalls. At the time, she was spending three days a week with cognitively impaired individuals in fitness and cooking programs.

She continued to go to Baycrest with school friends from Eitz Chaim Day Schools when she was in Grade 8. The girls would sing to residents on Shabbat afternoon.

Before she began visiting the woman she sees now, she visited another resident who died two years after her visits began.

"It was hard," Davids admits, explaining that residents and volunteers develop friendships. "You share a lot of stuff."

Baycrest's Teen Council, the leadership arm of the volunteen program, for which she has served as president, offers support and mentoring to volunteers, in part to deal with situations like the death of a resident, but Davids didn't take advantage of it when "her" patient died.

Davids is also involved in a leadership capacity with National Conferency of Synagogue Youth, as president of its central chapter, and at her school as one of two leaders of the school choir.

Children deserve dignity, respect, says rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Children must be treated with dignity and respect, while at the same time, they must be taught to treat others that way as well, Rabbi Paysach Krohn, a lecturer and author, said recently, couching his message in parables and jokes.

Rabbi Krohn was speaking at the third annual Sam and Sarah Kerzner memorial lecture of Eitz Chaim Schools, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Teachers and parents who teach their children Torah values "are the real stars of their generation," he said. When a home and a school are imbued with love of Torah and kindness towards others, then children will automatically also show those qualities, he said.

Rabbi Krohn slammed "dirty ads" and immoral television programs as "works of Amalek." (Amalek is the traditional archenemy of the Jewish people, dedicated to their downfall.)

"Amalek is not letting us transfer our midos (good character traits) to the next generation," he said.

Adults, he stressed, can only transfer Torah by treating children with dignity and care.

Rabbis and rebbes (teachers) "must be put on a pedestal," he said, and never criticized in front of the children. "If you speak of them with scorn, how can you expect your children to go to them if they have problems?"

Don't make your home "a place of terror," he advised, quoting a study which showed that 19 out of

Rabbi Paysach Krohn

20 messages a child hears at home are negative.

"If you can't get it together to be ready for Shabbat, how can you yell at your kids for leaving their homework until the last minute? And what's the point of shouting, 'Don't get killed on your bike'? Do you think kids go out intending to get killed?"

If you must criticize your children (or anyone else), he said, don't use harsh or embarrassing labels. "You will forget what you called them in two minutes — they will remember it all their lives."

Let children feel they are growing up, he said. Give them the chance to make mistakes.

If children see stress and strife in the home, "they will lose faith in the structure of their lives." While acknowledging that divorce is necessary at times, "don't think for a minute that it doesn't affect the kids," he warned.

Teach your children to feel the pain of those who have less good fortune, ability or capability than they do, he said.

When a husband goes out in an evening to study, or a wife goes to work with the chevra kadisha, the spouse shouldn't complain, the rabbi said. "The husband or wife will go anyway — but the children won't, because they will see that it leads to strife."

Remember most of all, he said, that one day "we will all have to answer before G-d."

Master of ceremonies for the evening was Moishe Korolnek. Divrei Torah were given by Eitz Chaim students Sarit Wokenstein and Tzvi Lewis.

Sam and Sarah Kerzner were praised by Harry Korolnek for their long-standing involvement in charitable work, especially in being one of the founding families of Eitz Chaim.

The Kerzners' son, Joseph, who established the lecture series, brought greetings.

In an interesting fundraising technique, tapes of Rabbi Krohn's speech were being sold in the synagogue foyer a few minutes after the program ended.

Baycrest fundraiser planned

TORONTO — Getting the chance to wear an 18-karat gold necklace valued at $21,000 brings a smile to Mimi Greenspoon and Susan Fenwick, this year's co-chairs of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's annual gala.

A chance to win this glittering gold piece donated by Royal de Versailles Jewellers is one of the many good reasons to attend Baycrest's biggest fundraiser of the year on June 10 at the Sheraton Centre Grand Ballroom.

"We are inviting the community to be Scene at Le Cirque, says Greenspoon. "The theme suggests an odyssey into mystery and excitement, which is what we're offering our guests."

Guests can be part of it for $125 a ticket. Once inside, they'll enjoy dining and dancing, a casino and a live and a silent auction.

Everyone will have a chance to win the fabulous door prize — two Air Canada tickets to any scheduled worldwide destination. There is also a one-week package for two at the Hyatt Regency Grand Cayman Island. Other prizes await those who buy one or many tickets for the Bizarre Balloon Bust sponsored by Hazelton Lanes.

March of the Living stirs intense emotions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The pain of seeing barracks and old shoes at a concentration camp site in Poland juxtaposed with the elation of celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut at an army base in Israel with 6,000 others caused participants in the 1996 March of the Living to experience a roller-coaster of emotions.

So intense was the range of emotions that most agree it will take some time to sort through their experiences and process them in their minds.

"I think differently about things since I've come home." said Mindy Morris. "My days on the march were jam packed and a lot of things didn't hit me until we returned to Canada. Sometimes now, I think back on things and cry. It hits me at odd hours."

At a recent gathering of the youth and two of the three Holocaust survivors, Anita Eckstein, Norman Ziegler and Henry Melnick, who accompanied them on the march, all agreed that pre-trip orientation and knowledge they had of the Holocaust could not have prepared them for their visit to a concentration camp.

"When we got to Majdanek and I saw the barracks full of empty shoes, I realized each shoe represented a person," said Zena Haberman. "I took my shoes off and walked barefoot because I had to feel each person. In a paradox of emotions, when I told my friend what I had done, she said that she had danced around in her shoes because she was so happy to be wearing them. What unnerved us was that Majdanek was completely intact — it could become fully operational within 24 hours."

On a positive note, when the group was dancing and singing Israeli songs in front of a Krakow synagogue, a group of Polish school children joined in. "The kids were young and didn't know that we were Jewish, but the teacher certainly knew and she allowed them to dance with us," said Bryan Gerson.

They talked about one anti-Semitic incident, in which Jesse Kaufman was hit by a rock, but agreed that it was important not to focus on anti-Semitism.

"We have to focus on the great experience of the trip and not the few negative incidents. We really came away positive about Poland's Jewish community. It is constantly growing and since the fall of communism, there are Jewish day schools, a Jewish newspaper and a Jewish summer camp. This encouraged us greatly," Laura Bogomolny said.

"We think that there is anti-Semitism in Poland, but hopefully it is caused by ignorance rather than blind hatred and ignorance can be cured. A lot of the hate is not the fault of this generation — many have grown up without ever having seen a Jew. There is a vocal minority, but we think it will get better," added Jesse Gold.

Ziegler, a native of Poland, said bitterly that the hatred of Jews has been perpetuated for generations and "is fed to them with their mother's milk."

Eckstein, however, urged people not to generalize. "I was saved by a Polish family during the war and on this trip I met the daughter of that family. She came from Warsaw especially to meet the marchers."

Barbara Bank, a co-chair of the march, said that in Poland, the students became "witnesses to a lost world and gained memories of countless faces. They have liberated ghosts and therefore they are always responsible to remain tied to the memories."

Roz Davidson, also a march co-chair, expressed faith that the youth would carry on the message of tolerance.

Landing in Israel, most agreed, enabled them to push memories of Poland aside for awhile. "When the plane hit the ground I was more elated than I had ever been. I breathed in the air of Israel and from that second, I knew that was where I wanted to live," said Rae Brager.

"We celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut at Latroun, an army base in Jerusalem, and when we danced and sang in the amphitheatre, we could look up and see the whole theatre filled," said Jesse Gold.

"Going to Yad Vashem, however, made us realize we'd seen Poland and the concentration camps," said Gold. "Having been there put a whole new perspective on things. I experienced part of their experience and I saw everything in a new light. It was more painful. Yad Vashem brought us back to Poland. The Valley of the Lost Communities lists European cities and cites how many Jews lived in each one. We saw the names of cities we had visited — it was overwhelming."

Ziegler, who said he had prepared for the trip with mixed emotions, could not praise the youth enough for their support and encouragement.

Israel Salutes World Stamp Show in Toronto

Special Showcard Honors Canadian Holocaust Stamp

The Israel Postal Authority is pleased to announce its participation in CAPEX '96, Canada's fourth World Stamp Exhibition that will be held in the Metro Toronto Convention Centre from June 8-16.

The two stamps seen here were issued in 1995 by Israel (left) and Canada (right) as memorials to those who died in the Holocaust. The designs of these stamps will be reproduced on Israel's Showcard salute to CAPEX '96.

Israel will host a special ceremony on Sunday, June 9 at 2:00 p.m. in Room 201D on the Main Floor of the Convention Centre to celebrate the First Day of Issue of its Official CAPEX '96 Showcard. This Israel Postal Authority salute to CAPEX '96 reproduces the designs of both the recent Canadian and Israeli Holocaust Remembrance postage stamps. This ceremony is open to the public and free of charge.

After brief remarks by dignitaries from both the Israel Postal Authority and Canada Post Corporation, members of the audience will have a chance to purchase the Israel CAPEX '96 Showcards and have them autographed by the Israeli and Canadian stamp artists who created the respective Holocaust Remembrance stamp designs.

The Showcard also has space for both the Israeli and Canadian Holocaust stamps to be affixed and canceled with the respective CAPEX pictorial postmarks of both the Israeli and Canadian postal services.

The Israel CAPEX '96 Showcard will be printed in a limited and numbered edition of just 5,500 copies. This Showcard, an official Israel philatelic item, will be avidly sought not only by collectors of Israeli stamps, but also by collectors of Canadian stamps and those specializing in various popular collectible topics such as Judaica, Holocaust History, and World War II. Please place your order early to avoid possible disappointment.

After the ceremony and throughout the show period, people can view a wide and complete selection of current Israeli stamps and philatelic (stamp collecting) material that is available for sale at the special Israel CAPEX '96 Booth (#C17) on the second floor of the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

For those unable to attend the CAPEX '96 World Stamp Exhibition, but interested in purchasing the Israel CAPEX '96 Showcard and other Israeli stamps, contact your local dealer, or for further information,

Manhattan Project scientist describes his switch to pacifism

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He was given a standing ovation at the start of his address and another at the conclusion.

In between Joseph Rotblat recounted his experiences as a scientist working on the Manhattan Project, the United States' effort to construct the world's first atomic bomb in the 1940s, and the moral decision he made to withdraw from the project and become a self-proclaimed "man of peace."

Rotblat, who along with the Pugwash movement has been awarded the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize, told about 200 appreciative listeners at a University of Toronto lecture hall that he became a pacifist because of "the threat to human life on our planet" posed by nuclear weapons.

He said he joined the Manhattan Project out of fear that Hitler would get the A-bomb first and the free world would not have a deterrent. Later he realized that the concept of mutual deterrence was flawed, because it rested on an underlying assumption that world leaders would act rationally.

He said he also grew disillusioned by the wartime statement of Gen. Leslie Groves, who headed the Manhattan Project, saying that the bomb's target would not be Germany, but Japan. Rotblat said he realized then that its prime purpose was to intimidate the Soviets in the post-war world.

In 1955, Rotblat joined Albert Einstein and Bertrand Russell in signing a manifesto renouncing war and since then, he has campaigned to make the world nuclear free. He has met other scientists at Pugwash, N.S., where peace issues were discussed, and he has focused in particular on fellow men of science, appealing to their social conscience not to participate in devising deadly military technologies.

While Rotblat focused his speech almost exclusively on the dangers of nuclear war, he did not discuss recent arms limitation agreements between the superpowers nor the possibility of the proliferation of nuclear weapons to rogue states like Iran or Iraq.

Instead, he suggested the prospects of a nuclear-free world were bright and that he expected it to come early in the next century.

Rikudiyah dance festival draws over 400 students

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When the first Toronto Rikudiyah, the Israeli folk dance festival for children, was held 25 years ago, 40 children from three schools participated.

Last week 400 students from 18 Hebrew schools participated, and 1,100 spectators attended Rikudiyah '96, which was held at the main gymnasium of York University. This year's theme was Jerusalem 3000 with the festival taking place on erev Yom Yerushalim.

Rikudiyah which is sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts — Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is the brainchild of Teme Kernerman, who has been its artistic director since it began.

"Israeli dancing is part of our heritage. It's part of the whole culture. I wanted to get it into the schools," she said. "It's now pretty firmly planted. A lot of day and supplementary schools participate."

Kernerman, a recipient of the Ontario Arts Council award for her contribution to folk dancing in 1991, is the coordinator of senior adult services and folk dancing at the BJC, as well as the director/choreographer of the Chai Dancers, a group of seniors who also performed at Rikudiyah '96.

The festivities began with the blowing of the shofar by Dr. Ira Schweitzer, director of education at Temple Sinai. As each school was welcomed individually, the students marched onto the floor through a gate of Jerusalem which they had created especially for this event.

Kernerman researches and creates dances to fit the particular theme of each Rikudiyah. She then visits the schools to teach the dances to the teachers prior to the performance. All the schools perform the dances simultaneously on the floor with their teachers.

This is a performance without the pressure of performing, she said. "The important thing is to give them [the children] the exposure, let them enjoy it."

Two schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School and United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS), each sent dance troupes who gave their own special performances.

Other schools participating in the festival included Associated Hebrew Schools, B'nai Shalom Hebrew School, the Downtown Jewish Community School, Bet Sefer Solel, Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Sinai Religious Schools, Temple Har Zion Religious School, Temple Kol Ami, Richmond Hill Hebrew School, Leo Baeck Day School, Hamilton Hebrew Academy, and The Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School. Three branches of both USDS and Associated took part.

Kernerman is already working on the theme of next year's Rikudiyah, she says. "It's a labor of love. Israeli dance is my link with Israel."

UJA unveils campaign preview

It was a taste of the Campaign to come, with new gifts as the main course.

UJA Federation's Campaign '97 Leadership Launch last week focused on the importance of attracting new contributors in order to meet multiplying needs.

Last year, 9,000 donors subscribed to the Three Year Vision by pledging for each of 1996, 1997 and 1998. With so many contributors making a three year commitment, there's more time this year to reach out to new donors.

Campaign Chairman David Goldstein and Michael Daren, the Campaign Vice-chairman with David Engel, stressed the way in which new contributors can preserve the strength and vitality of Toronto's Jewish community. They also described UJA Federation as the embodiment of the community's values.

Talking Shop. Jewish Womens Federation President Jill Reitman with former UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair, Barbara Bank.

Art Benjamin, Chair of the Internet Steering Committee, gave a brief presentation about Jewish Toronto, the Federation's web site.

Mike Rosenberg, Co-Chair of UJA's Societies Division, makes a point at a Leadership Launch strategy session.

UJA Campaign Vice Chairman Michael Daren.

Campaign Chairman David Goldstein called UJA "the greatest Campaign on earth."

Rhonda Levy shares a laugh with Heather Scott (middle) and Penny East, Co-Chairs of UJA's Marketing Division.

Money talk. Accountants Eldon Moses (l), Stephen Altbaum (middle), and David Green (r), Co-Chair of UJA's Major Gifts Division.

Gary Grundman and Rosanne Ain are spearheading efforts to attract new donors as New Gifts Co-Chairs.

Community Matters

JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

– A Year in Review –

From the President

For the Federation, as for most of Ontario, last year was dominated by provincial spending reductions. The Queen's Park budget cuts created new funding pressures and compelled us and our beneficiary agencies to reassess the way in which we operate.

Altered government financial priorities have not only profoundly affected agency services, they have increased the urgency of Financial Resource Development, which brings together all our fundraising efforts. Never before has integrated fundraising been so important. Never before has the need for fundraising been so acute.

Over the next 18 months, we will be embarking on unprecedented campaigns to raise our consciousness about community and what is required for our future financial health. At the same time, we have an obligation to closely examine the duplication of community services and move toward integration, wherever feasible.

These new financial realities offered the Federation an opportunity to engage in dialogue and build coalitions with other ethno-cultural and faith communities, facing similar circumstances.

The fiscal face of the community was not the only thing that changed. The Israel-Diaspora relationship underwent a transformation as well. We recognized the need for a genuine partnership with Israel. Through missions, such as Mission 3000 - the largest in Canadian history - retreats and Project Renewal, so many members of our community experienced a shared sense of achievement with our brothers and sisters in Israel and around the world.

It was a year of firsts in other ways. The Action Committee for Jewish Continuity, led by Les Klein, pioneered $100,000 in grants for innovative and exciting continuity projects, with another round scheduled for later this year. The Commission on Jewish Education, chaired by Bev Lyons, issued a comprehensive report after an exhaustive study of our community's educational resources.

Last year, we dramatically expanded our communications and marketing efforts to let our community members know the extent to which the Federation touches all our lives and to encourage increased participation in our work.

None of this would have been possible without a team of volunteers and professionals whose skill and commitment are not only boundless but often beyond description. To them I extend my thanks. They are the assurance of a magnificent future for our remarkable community.

Sandra Brown

FINANCIAL RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

Financial Resource Development (FRD) unites all streams of community gift giving. Our objective is to preserve the remarkable Jewish quality of life in our community and ensure uninterrupted support for essential projects in Israel and Jews in distress around the world. FRD coordinates fundraising from all possible sources, with special attention to donor needs and wishes. United Jewish Appeal and the Federation's Bequest and Endow-ment Fund are the two most significant components of FRD.

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL

Charles Gold and Carol Kassel, Co-chairs
Marlene Axmith, Women's Campaign Chair

United Jewish Appeal has been the Federation's primary fundraising arm, through the annual campaign.

In 1995, UJA undertook an unprecedented approach to community fundraising - The Three Year Vision. Thirty percent of our contributors - more than 9,000 donors - committed themselves to gifts, not only for 1996, but for 1997 and 1998 as well. As a result, we have a strong financial foundation with which to start the 1997 Campaign. In addition, the success of the Three Year Vision gives us time to reach out to new contributors.

Last year, the Women's Campaign raised $3.8 million of total UJA Federation contributions. Outreach, especially to new contributors is one of the Women's Campaign's critical elements.

UJA Federation is faced with multiplying Jewish needs both here and overseas; needs that require the broadest possible participation by community members in our fundraising efforts.

BEQUEST & ENDOWMENT FUND

Paul Morton, Chair

The Fund provides permanent financial resources, which are prudently invested to meet community needs.

Gifts to the Fund are generally made by cash, a bequest in a will and through life insurance, securities or assets that can be turned into cash.

The Fund sponsors scholarships for Jewish students in post-secondary institutions and for Jewish communal professionals. It also conducts a yearly seminar for hundreds of practitioners in accounting, law and estate planning.

ONTARIO JEWISH ARCHIVES

Cyrel Troster, Chair

The Ontario Jewish Archives, which preserves the history of Jewish Ontario:

- served over 900 researchers from across Canada, the US, Israel, Europe and South America
- completed cataloguing records of the JIAS Toronto office
- received a grant from the Canadian Council of Archives
- acted as a resource for exhibitions at Baycrest, Beth Tzedec and Shaarei Shomayim, as well as for television productions on TVO, The Women's Network and Rogers Cable

BOARD OF JEWISH EDUCATION

Joseph M. Steiner, Chair

The Board administers subsidies to Jewish school students whose families cannot afford full tuition fees, organizes professional development programs for teachers and administrators, operates a library on educational topics, an audio visual department and Teacher Creativity Centre. In 1995 BJE:

- expanded its teacher certification programs through the Midrasha L'Morim (Jewish Teachers Seminary)
- coordinated the highly successful annual Choir Festival (Zimriya), Dance Festival (Rikudiya), National Bible Contest and Jewish Book Month Creative Writing Contest
- initiated day-long conferences for supplementary school personnel and day school educators
- served as a clearing house for schools seeking personnel and professionals seeking employment in Jewish schools.

DEPARTMENT FOR HUMAN RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

Francie Storm, Chair

The department recruits, trains, places and provides ongoing development for community volunteers and professionals.

During the past year, HRD:

- interviewed and referred over 100 volunteers to positions with in our affiliated agencies and schools
- welcomed over 400 Jewish new borns into the community
- convened the forum of agency and school presidents
- delivered leadership development programming opportunities to emerging leaders
- conducted a variety of professional education programs
- conducted several presentations on Federation to boards of agencies and schools
- took significant steps towards integration of HRD and UJA activity

HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE COMMITTEE

Eleanor Getzler, Chair

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee is committed, first and foremost, to preserving the Shoah's place in history. To accomplish this essential goal, the Committee strongly emphasizes anti-racism education. Highlights of activities of this past year include:

- the 10th anniversary of the Holocaust Education & Memorial Centre of Toronto
- the launching of the Holocaust Resource Centre with its hi-tech multimedia equipment and extensive library
- seminars for more than 1600 students and teachers
- 20,000 student visitors to the Holocaust Centre
- annual Holocaust Education Week and Yom Hashoah community programs

COMMUNITY PLANNING & ALLOCATIONS

Alan Sandler, Chair

Community Planning & Allocations (CP&A) addresses a wide variety of community needs through planning, policy setting, program development, budgeting and evaluation. Highlights of CP&A's work include:

- awarding of a significant number of outreach grants to fund innovative continuity programs in the community
- establishing a consortium of Israel Experience purveyors to develop and coordinate activities and trip promotion
- developing a Transition Fund to assist agencies in restructuring to meet the constrained fiscal environment
- creating a new committee, chaired by Lou Greenbaum, to look at communal infrastructure needs in York Region
- placing a Federation web site on the Internet

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION

Jill Reitman, President

Jewish Women's Federation is the umbrella organization for nearly 50 diverse Jewish women's volunteer organizations. Together with Women's Campaign of UJA, it helps provide outreach to newcomers to Toronto through the Shalom Toronto Program and to promote Jewish continuity through the Timeless Treasures learning series. The activities of the Social and Political Action portfolio and the Community Response Project sensitize the community to issues of concern to Jewish women, and help to empower individuals and organizations to respond.

UJA Federation: A Year in Review

Award Winners to be Honoured at Annual Meeting

Ben Sadowski Award of Merit

The Ben Sadowski Award is presented annually by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to an outstanding community leader.

This year's recipient is JACK CHISVIN, former President of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and National President of Canadian Technion Society.

Jack's longtime involvement with UJA Federation includes fundraising, the Board of Jewish Education, UJA's Board of Directors and Chairing the UJA Federation By-law Committee. He has devoted much of his time to Jewish education as a member of the Commission on Jewish Education and was awarded an honourary fellowship by Technion University in 1988.

In addition to his current position as President of Canadian Technion Society, Jack serves on the Board of the Canada Israel Committee, the Council of Jewish Federations and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Leadership Development Awards

These annual awards were established to encourage the assumption of community leadership roles by young men and women. They are presented to those who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

HEATHER MILSTEIN is a social worker with the Children's Aid Society of Metro Toronto and a member of the Jewish Camp Council Board.

As a graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, Heather has continued to be an active UJA canvasser and strong supporter of a wide variety of UJA Federation activities. She is the 1997 campaign Co-chair of the UJA Federation's Young Professionals Network and currently serves on the Leadership Development Program Committee of UJA Federation's Human Resource Development Department.

ROBERT FURMAN is a chartered accountant who has been the President of Toronto Jewish Immigrant Aid Services since 1994. A graduate of the Young Leadership Development Program, Robert co-chaired UJA Federation's Accountants Division and served on the Federation's Integration Sub-committee and the Council of Jewish Federation's Task Force on Immigration Planning.

Shem Tov Awards

These awards are presented annually to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to Toronto's Jewish Community.

KAREN CHISVIN
Bloor Jewish Community Centre
Karen, a Leadership Development Graduate, has volunteered in the Jewish community for the last 13 years. She is the Immediate Past President of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and sits on the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Directors.

DAVID HERLICK
Senior Care/Community Service to Jewish Elderly
David has been a member of the Senior Care Board of Directors for close to 20 years. During that time, he served on many Board committees and has held a number of executive positions, including President (1981-84) and Treasurer. David is a founding Board Member of the Habayit Shelanu Senior Residents Corporation and continues to sit on the Board.

HAROLD HERTZMAN
Toronto Free Loan Cassa
An active volunteer with the Loan Cassa for over 20 years, Harold is a member of the committee which administers business loans. His expertise has contributed to the committee becoming an esential component of the agency and, in turn, an important resource for the Jewish community. In addition, Harold is a long-time member of the Board of Jewish Education and has served on the Board of the United Jewish Welfare Fund.

JESSICA PELT
Jewish Campus Services
As Editor of Images, the student newspaper of UJA Federation's Jewish Campus Services, Jessica is committed to reshaping and revitalizing Jewish campus life by connecting Jewish students from across Toronto to the community. A CHAT graduate currently studying at U of T, Jessica attributes her community involvement to her day school education and association with Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

DOROTHY SHOICHET
Bathurst Jewish Centre
Dorothy's commitment to the Koffler Centre of the Arts is truly extraordinary. As President since 1993, she works unceasingly to raise funds needed to support the exhibition program of the Koffler and Loggia Galleries. Dorothy is also a member of the Board of Directors of the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Board of Kolel.

Bialik builds Jerusalem

If you can't travel to Jerusalem, well, why not bring Jerusalem to Toronto? That's what students at Bialik Hebrew Day School did last week for both Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day) and the city's 3000th birthday. Bialik is one of many Jewish schools receiving support from UJA Federation.

Eight hundred students decorated their three storey school, from top to bottom, to look just like the ancient capital.

From junior kindergarten to grade 8, kids pitched in during the three week renovation which began shortly before Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel's Independence Day). Hallways were transformed into scenes depicting holy sites such as the Western Wall (kotel). Palm trees and Jerusalem stone painted on mural paper stretched across school walls and extended into archways and gateways to the old city.

Junior and senior kindergarten children built their own model kotel out of cardboard boxes and a replica of the Temple out of sugar cubes painted gold. All over the school, biblical figures sat perched in unexpected places, gazing at the holy sites of Jerusalem as seen through the eyes of the students.

Grade 7 and 8 students even set up an Israeli style shuk (market) with jewellery merchants, fortune tellers and bargaining chatter. Money raised from selling handmade items at the shuk will go to a school in the northern Israel town of Kiryat Shmona.

Odelia Bekerman, 14, said recreating Jerusalem at school made her feel "closer to Israel." To Eric Gertzbeir, also 14, Jerusalem is a "symbol of hope and strength that will continue forever."

Two shows depicting Jerusalem's 3000 year history were presented in the morning and in the afternoon. Each performance contained English, Hebrew, French and Yiddish dialogue to reflect the school's diverse Zionist heritage.

Israeli Consul General Jehudi Kinar thanked the students for making him "feel so much at home."

The school-wide display will continue until next week.

Grade 5 students (from left to right) Hailey Banack, Geoffrey Sas and Jordan Rosenbaum, waiting for a breeze from their replica windmill.

Young architechts Justin Goldberg and Sasha Fink present their sugar cube version of the Temple.

Jewish show waiting for funding

A new national Jewish television program is on the horizon, if it can raise $400,000.

While Vision TV has agreed to broadcast the Jewish Magazine current affairs show beginning this fall, the producers still need funding for a full season's production. Producers Janice Maser, Howard Bernstein and Stephen Gardner are looking to the private sector for sponsorship. "We really need the support of businesses," says Maser, who explains that Jewish Magazine will be unlike anything ever aired before. "It's going to be like a Jewish 60 Minutes."

The weekly half hour news magazine, which covers everything from sports to entertainment to social issues, aired as a pilot program on Vision TV in March. According to Maser, the show was a "hit" across Canada. "I even got calls from places as far off as Penticton B.C.," she reports.

Maser and her co-producers attribute the pilot's success to high professional standards and sound journalistic principles. "The show," says Maser, "is professional both in appearance and content. It's not what most people are used to in Jewish programming."

Gardner is a nine year veteran journalist who has worked as a writer for The Journal on CBC, CTV National News and Canada AM. Bernstein, well-known and respected in the media world, has worked as a writer and a TV producer for 25 years. Maser, a health care consultant, has 20 years of marketing, communications and business development experience.

Victoria Jews reminisce about the 'old days'

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Memories ... memories ...

In a Jewish community like Victoria's, where almost everybody comes from somewhere else, the seniors and even the younger element have fond memories of the good/bad old days. Most oldsters say, "I could write a book about my earlier years," but few do.

However, Sonia Birch-Jones, a professional writer, coaxed a host of reminiscences out of a group of seniors, as part of a Jewish Community Centre project. With help from Gillian Levy in compiling and editing, she has produced a 183-page book, Generation to Generation, which was launched at a luncheon May 19 and sells at local book stores at $12.

In the anthology, some 26 writers tell of their experiences literally all over the world.

"It is my hope," says Birch-Jones in the preface, "that the people who read this book, young and old, will themselves understand the importance of writing down their 'memories' so that they too will be preserved from generation to generation."

Harry Brown, known as "the bagman," for his ability to raise funds for various community activities, was born in Andrew, Alta., near Edmonton.

He came here in 1969 to manage a hotel. One of his fondest memories is a community seder held in the refurbished beer parlor of the hotel.

As Brown recalls the event, Rabbi Harvey Markowitz led the service "and it soon became so festive that the rabbi was singing and dancing on the bar tables."

One project which gave him much satisfaction was the restoration of the 133-year-old synagogue on the same premises. The synagogue, he says, was really only a shell with no foundations, but the provincial government stepped in with Heritage architects and engineers and when the work was concluded, Congregation Emanu-El was declared a Heritage building. It's still the only synagogue in the city.

Shlomo Efrat, a retired history professor from the University of Victoria, tells of his experiences as an Eretz Yisrael soldier with the British Army during World War II. He found himself in Aleppo, claimed to be the world's second oldest city. Some local men, rather astonished at his Eretz Yisrael shoulder badge, led him through a dark cavern under a tailor shop, where the local synagogue was located. Members of the shul, eager for news about the "outside world," pumped him with questions. Efrat told them about the current political situation in Palestine, the formation of the Haganah and the Jews enlisting in the British Army.

"To my surprise," he writes, the rabbi announced from the bimah that the mal'ach (messenger, angel) had arrived "and the shofar is returning home."

The black shofar kept in the Ark had been given to the synagogue by some Maccabeans for safekeeping in the days when the Temple was still standing. It was to be returned to the land of Israel by Jewish soldiers some day. The shofar was over 2,00 years old and Efrat had the joyful task of turning it over to the proper rabbinical authorities in Jerusalem.

Irving Margolese, one of the founders of the Jewish Community Centre, lived in Winnipeg during the Great Depression. Broke and discouraged by the anti-Semitism rampant in the city, he decided to go to England where, he had heard, life was somewhat better for Jews. So he took the usual route from Winnipeg to Montreal as an attendant for a shipment of cattle and then got a job on a ship to England as "nursemaid" to 600 cows — not an easy task! He went over on the SS Sularia, and after a few weeks in England, had enough money to return to Canada on the SS Duchess of York.

World War II started shortly afterward, both ships on which Margolese had sailed were sunk and he joined the Canadian Army.

Gillian Levy lived in England when it was being blitzed by the Nazis. As a little girl, she and her family found shelter at "a house for displaced persons," in London. It was a Queen's Road kosher boarding home, filled with the displaced persons of war-torn Europe. One of Levy's favorite memories is that one resident, whom she knew as Rev Zucker, kept his flowing curly locks together with a pink hairnet — something that made her giggle every time she saw him.

Dan Fill, who moved with his parents to Victoria to flee "Toronto's smog, black flies and freezing rain," says he's opposed to the separation of Quebec from Canada because it would then be inconvenient to visit Swartz's, his favorite Montreal deli. In a way, he says, living in Canada is like eating at Swartz's: "There are a lot of things wrong with the place, but the overall quality is the best in the world. If we took any part away from Canada, it wouldn't be the same ..."

Annette Rose, came to Victoria as a bride 50 years ago. It was a small town, but there were 31 children in the Hebrew school and she became their teacher. Many years ago, she said, Israel's Chief Rabbi came to visit. He pronounced Victoria Gan-Eden. She agrees.

Ethel Tennenhouse, who spent much of her life on farms in Saskatchewan, writes of how she enjoyed making ice cream, using cream from the family's cows and ice from a local ice house. No electric refrigerators those days, she says.

Illustrations in Generation to Generation are by Rosalyn Chodos. Proceeds of the sale of books will aid the Jewish Seniors Society of Vancouver Island, headed by Lorna Denning.

Sometimes the Simplest Things are the Most Special.

Everyone has their own idea of what simple means. To us at The Simple Alternative it means good taste and common sense. Simplicity is one of the hallmarks of Jewish funeral tradition. Expensive caskets and elaborate services are not part of this tradition. And, as many of our families tell us: sometimes the simplest things are the most special.

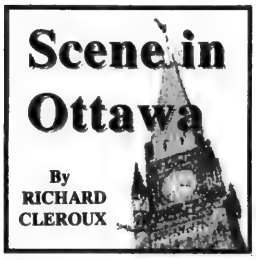
CIC keeps a close eye on activity on the Hill



OTTAWA — What is known on Parliament Hill as "the Jewish lobby" is run out of a modest three-room office suite on the sixth floor of a commercial building in downtown Ottawa.

Canadian Jews know the agency by its official name, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). It is a fascinating operation, generally regarded as one of the best-run political lobbies in the national capital.

Officially, CIC is the agency that speaks on bilateral relations between Canada and Israel. It has a board headed by Montrealer Stephen Victor who is its chair. It calls itself "an advocacy group" and keeps a "low profile" for strategic reasons. Behind the scenes, it's a beehive of activity.

Executive director Rob Ritter, a tough-talking, no nonsense, new-school lobbyist, runs the Ottawa office. This is the place where advocacy work can be interesting.

Ritter and CIC staffer Shimon Fogel, a walking encyclopedia on who's who in politics in Ottawa, specialize in government relations.

In Ottawa, that means knowing every last little political secret on the Hill, knowing not only what legislation is coming up and how it will hurt or help Canada-Israel relations, but even what legislation might have come up and why it didn't.

It means knowing what goes on in caucus, who is saying what about Israel, who Israel's real "friends" are and which MPs and senators aren't so friendly to Israel behind closed doors.

It means knowing the senior bureaucrats, what they think and and where they stand on various political issues. There are hundreds of bureaucrats in Ottawa whose personal views and the advice they give on Canada-Israel issues is far more important than whatever the politicians happen to be thinking.

It also means knowing reporters on Parliament Hill, tracking events in the daily news media and charting the image of Israel in the daily press.

CIC means a lot of other things to different people.

For backbenchers, CIC is that lobby group with all those great free trips to Israel.

CIC organizes all-expenses paid, two-week-long junkets to Israel every year for about a dozen politicians. They get to stay in the best Israeli hotels, meet senior politicians and all sorts of interesting people, and maybe learn something about the Israeli way of life and something about the political problems.

Some politicians are chosen because they are already considered "friends" of Israel, but others who are quite "neutral," are chosen because they are considered to have the sort of open mind that might benefit from a free trip to Israel.

"I like to say that I don't think anyone can really understand the politics of Israel and the Middle East, until they've actually been there," says Ritter. He regrets that Reform party MPs, who are forbidden to accept political junkets, have never taken part. But members of all other parties have, including New Democrats and especially the Bloc Quebecois, who have been among the most enthusiastic and appreciative of visitors.

Cabinet ministers who have visited Israel in recent years include Allan Rock, Herb Gray, Sheila Finestone and David Dingwall.

For most Canadian gentiles, CIC is the organization that sponsors the annual Canada-Israel political dinner in Ottawa — one of the big social events in the national capital.

Usually the Israeli prime minister shows up as the guest speaker. This year both Shimon Peres and Jean Chrétien had been scheduled to speak until the early election call forced a postponement.

For many reporters, CIC is the organization that produces those superb information directories on Israeli politics, listing the myriad Israeli political parties, their strengths, their platforms and where they stand on various issues. It's an outstanding piece of research, an invaluable guide to Israeli national elections. As well, the CIC publishes for reporters an excellent Directory of Middle East Experts with hundreds of names, addresses, telephone, fax and Internet numbers and a brief background on each entry.

It's prepared with help from the CIC's staffer in Toronto, media specialist Paul Michaels, and the CIC's research twin in Toronto, David Goldberg's Foundation for Middle East Studies.

There is a separate CIC in Quebec, which relates to the Quebec provincial government, as well as a staffer, Phillipa El Harar, who specializes in government and media relations.

Where other Jewish organizations call news conferences and issue a flood of news releases, the CIC strives for anonymity.

"My own ambition is to get things done with as little publicity as possible," says Ritter, who has been with the CIC for seven years.

The focus on CIC has changed entirely in the last five years. Back then, the intifadah was going full rip, Israel was under siege in the United Nations and the CIC spent most of its time defending Israel in the news media.

"Now the focus is on more positive things," says Ritter. It's good to be setting your own agenda."

The CIC's major achievements in the last three years have included a joint scientific and technical research institute allowing the two countries to share technology, the new Canada-Israel free trade agreement, estimated to be worth millions of dollars in trade annually to both countries, and contributing to peace by facilitating the flow of Arab and Palestinian dollars from Canada into Gaza and the territories.

Thanks to the CIC's work behind the scenes, the Canada-Israel free trade talks went from about 150 on Canada's list of free trade priorities, right up to the top, with a signature ceremony expected this summer.

Population boom expected in Victoria

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Victoria's Jewish community is still small, but it has to start thinking big as the Jewish population continues to grow.

A report issued by the Jewish Federation of Greater Victoria and Vancouver Island says a recent survey indicates that 50 percent of the Jewish people here have arrived in the past 10 years and suggests that "the community could be on the verge of a decade of doubling."

The general population of the city grew by 13 percent in 10 years and as newcomers continue to pour in, it is expected the Jewish population will increase as well.

"The changes taking place in other Jewish centres will also be felt here," the report predicts. It points out that in 1945, Vancouver "was a blip" on the Canadian Jewish map. Now it's a major centre, branching out to the far reaches of the Lower Mainland. Victoria's population is spreading north, up-Island to cities like Nanaimo, Parksville and Courtenay — all of which are served by the Victoria Jewish community.

The report points out that Victoria's network of Jewish organizations has grown. About eight years ago, the Jewish community Centre was created. It houses a small library and a delicatessen, and offers a variety of programs.

Victoria now has two Hadassah chapters, an ORT group, a Women's League sisterhood affiliated with Conservative Judaism, a Hebrew Assistance Association, a Chevra Kadisha, the Society for Humanistic Judaism and the Seniors Housing Society.

Most Israel-related organizations run campaigns here.

And there's the synagogue, built in 1863 and still in use — the oldest synagogue building in Canada.

Clinton pledges continued support for peace

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON - U.S. President Bill Clinton last week promised to continue support for Israel as the peace process proceeds.

In a commencement address at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy in Connecticut that focused on national defence, Clinton said that "there will be problems" periodically, because the enemies of peace will show their own desperation with bullets and bombs.

"So I say this to the people of Israel: We've been with you every step of the way for the last three years. As Israel takes further risks for peace in the future, it can count on further manifestations of U.S. support.

"We must be with you every step of the way until there is a comprehensive, lasting peace in the Middle East. Now is not the time to turn back, and the United States must do its part."

Clinton has made it a mainstay of his Middle East policy to regularly, and publicly, reassure Israel that as it takes "risks" for peace, America would stand by it and help minimize those risks.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres responded to Clinton's remarks by saying, "Todah, chaver" Israel Radio reported.

Meanwhile, talks on the Operation Grapes of Wrath monitoring committee scheduled for last week at the State Department were cancelled at the last minute.

Israeli officials explained that the postponement was due to decisions still to be finalized in Middle East capitals on the monitoring committee's mandate, but would not say whether new difficulties had arisen.

The officials were unsure when talks would resume.

Following the sixth day of meetings, Syrian Ambassador Walid Mualem told reporters that Damascus had proposed that the five-member committee to be comprised of the United States, France, Israel, Syria and Lebanon be convened within 72 hours after the lodging of a complaint of a cease-fire violation, and that during that time, no retaliatory action could occur.

He also said that because of disagreements over defining the borders of the security zone in southern Lebanon, the draft agreement will omit the matter altogether.

Mualem said that in the event of an incident in Lebanon, the Israeli representative would not be part of the investigating team, and if in Israel, the Syrian and Lebanese officials would not be included. In such cases, the United States and French would enter the territory, he said.

State Department spokesperson Nicholas Burns told reporters the United States believes Israeli-Syrian peace talks could resume "as soon as possible" following the elections.

The U.S. view is based on conversations held recently between Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Israeli, Lebanese and Syrian leaders, Burns said.

He said he did not know whether Damascus' agreement to proceed with the negotiations is conditioned on Peres emerging victorious next week.

Meanwhile, Iran rejected the U.S. claim that Iran is the main sponsor of international terrorism.

The United States and Israel are out to destroy Iran's Islamic government by leveling false accusations of terrorism against it, Teheran Radio said.

"Relentless and fabricated propaganda by the United States and the Zionist regime is part of their common strategy to destroy the Islamic government in Iran," the radio said.

It challenged Washington to prove allegations of Iranian involvement in terrorism anywhere in the world.

Turkey denies rift over military accord

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Senior Israeli officials were assured in Ankara last week that Turkey is not dissatisfied with the bilateral military cooperation agreement that has deepened ties between the two countries, Foreign Ministry officials insist.

The Turkish Foreign Ministry reportedly issued a statement to this effect last week, denying reported comments by Prime Minister Mesut Yilmaz that the agreement did more harm than good.

Yilmaz, fighting to keep his fragile coalition in power in the face of an Islamic challenge, reportedly raised doubts about the accord, which has been criticized primarily by Syria and Iran. Two Turkish newspapers cited Yilmaz as telling his own party that the accord may have done more harm than good.

"The harm of this accord has outweighed its advantages," Yilmaz reportedly said. "We are working on it. This has yet to be corrected."

Speaking to the Washington-based National Press Club last week, Turkish Foreign Minister Emre Gonensay expressed support for the agreement, terming it "a blueprint agreement for military training, which increases the defensive capacity of the Turkish military forces."

In an interview with The Jerusalem Post last week, Foreign Minister Ehud Barak said Israel wanted to maintain close ties with Ankara, since "Turkey is a very important regional power ... especially when you look in terms of Iraq, Iran and former Soviet Central Asian republics. Turkey is very important to Israel. Yet our cooperation is not against anyone; it is designed to increase stability, peace and cooperation."

In February, Defense Ministry Director-General David Ivry and Turkish Deputy Chief of Staff Cevik Bir signed the bilateral military cooperation agreement, which is widely believed to involve shared military training, exchange of observers, intelligence and an exchange of visits by aircraft and naval vessels. Israel will be permitted to use Turkish air space for training four weeks a year.

There have also been reports that the agreement includes exchange of intelligence cooperation against Iran and Israeli technical support for Turkish efforts to stem infiltrations by Kurdish terrorists.

A full version of the accord has been reportedly printed in the last few days in the Islamic weekly Aksyion.

Admiral Guven Erkaya, commander of the Turkish navy, is now visiting Israel at the invitation of OC Navy Rear-Admiral Alex Tal. He was scheduled to meet with Prime Minister Shimon Peres last week.

It is precisely the support of the powerful Turkish military which gives Israelis and analysts hope that the agreement will withstand the criticism of Syria, Iran and Islamic elements inside Turkey.

Alan Makovsky, an expert on Turkey at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, remained cautiously optimistic.

"Operationally, I believe Turkey will be able to hold the line and maintain the agreement, because the military, which is very influential in matters of national security, seems very determined to keep it in place. They feel a connection with Israel, the strongest military power in the region.

"They see the agreement as very much in the Turkish national strategic interest, and particularly as a deterrent to Syrian support of Kurdish terrorism. I think the Turkish military sees its cooperation with Israel as a strategic relationship that should grow," Makovsky said.

AIPAC leader resigns

By HILLEL KUTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – For the second time in two years, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) is losing its executive director.

Neal Sher, who had gained fame by heading the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which prosecuted former Nazis living in the United States, informed AIPAC's board just hours before the start of Shavuot that he was resigning to return to academia.

"I think it's been a good two years. The organization I left is in good shape. I think it's appropriate to move on to other things," Sher said in an interview.

Sher said he would be assuming an adjunct professor position at an unnamed university. He will also assist in retrieving the assets of Holocaust victims from Swiss banks.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its second annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit photographs either of Israel or of any Jewish theme in their communities. They must be original photos" shot" by the reader.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address, and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1.

The contest closes at 5:00 pm on Monday August 26th, 1996.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative.
The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.00.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners". We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, August 30, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Sept. 12, 1996.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Small parties could hold balance of power

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Two small parties may hold the key to the outcome of Israel's May 29 general election, the results of which will be known this week.

Mideast Analysis

For weeks now, pundits have speculated that undecided voters may seal the fate of Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu, the respective leaders of the Labor party and the Likud.

And while there is a strong element of truth in this assertion, the denouement of the election may well hinge on how The Third Way and Yisrael Ba'Aliyah fare at the polls.

Composed primarily of ex-Labor party members who fear the prospect of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for a peace treaty with Syria, The Third Way is led by Avigdor Kahalani, a former general who acquitted himself brilliantly against the Syrians during the Yom Kippur War.

Apart from its unyielding position on the Golan, The Third Way believes that Israeli strategic interests demand the retention of a good portion of the West Bank, with 90 percent of its Jewish settlers. The Third Way also contends that the Oslo peace process is deeply flawed.

Ideologically, The Third Way — whose motto is "peace with secure borders"— stands somewhere between the Labor party and the Likud. The Third Way hopes to win as many as 12 Knesset seats, but even if it falls far short of its goal, it may find itself holding the balance of power as Labor or Likud try to form a coalition government.

Natan Sharansky's Yisrael Ba'Aliyah, which was formed this year, may also play a pivotal role in post-election negotiations.

Appealing almost exclusively to disaffected Soviet immigrants whose integration into Israeli society has been problematic, Yisrael Ba'Aliyah's raison d'etre is its belief that Israel lacks a far-reaching plan to bring in and absorb new olim. (Since 1989, the vast majority of immigrants have arrived from the now-defunct Soviet Union).

The Labor party has good reason to be worried about the impact Yisrael Ba'Aliyah may have on Israel's 400,000 eligible Soviet voters. In the 1992 election, Labor's standard-bearer, Yitzhak Rabin, won the backing of nearly two-thirds of Soviet olim. But according to the latest surveys, the Labor party will be lucky if it siphons off 30 percent of the Soviet vote.

Like The Third Way, Yisrael Ba'Aliyah — which is to the right of the Labor party but to the left of the Likud — has a chance of winning several seats and thus playing a crucial role in post-electioneering negotiations.

Sharansky, who is seen as a politician with moderate views, could throw his support behind either Peres or Netanyahu.

Israel's Arab minority of 800,000 could also have an impact on the election. Israeli Arabs are in a rambunctious mood, angry over the extended closure of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, Operation Grapes of Wrath and the wide disparities with respect to the funding of Arab and Jewish municipalities.

Several weeks ago, Israeli Arab leaders threatened to boycott the election altogether, leaving the Labor party in a bind. Without the massive support of the Israeli Arab bloc, Peres' chances of triumphing over Netanyahu are dismal.

Yet at the end of the day, Israeli Arabs have relatively little leverage. Given their interest in the success of the peace process in its present form, they really have no alternative but to rally behind Peres and the Labor party. Last week, bowing to reality, three of the four Arab parties contesting the election announced they would encourage their followers to vote for Peres.

Ironically, Arab forces antithetical to Israel's existence and the peace process, notably Hamas and Hezbollah, are in a position to influence the election. If Arab rejectionists succeed in spilling Israeli blood before the polls close, Peres may be the real loser.

On the eve of the election, there was no shortage of terrorist incidents. Near the Jewish settlement of Beit El on the West Bank, in an area under Israeli control, a 17-year-old settler was killed in a drive-by shooting, prompting the Likud to condemn Peres' peace policy. Peres, for his part, suggested that Iran was behind the attack and that it was "trying to intervene" in Israel's election.

Worse still, a potential suicide bomber recruited by Hezbollah, carrying a forged British passport and plastic explosives, made it past the security screen at Ben-Gurion airport last month. Had he not seriously wounded himself while assembling a bomb in an East Jerusalem hotel, he would have tried to smuggle the device on board an El Al passenger plane, with all the bloody consequences.

These incidents illustrate a sombre truism. Regardless of which major party wins, Israelis will have to deal with the spectre of terrorism for many years to come. Peace process or no peace process, terrorism is the weapon of choice of Arabs who cannot reconcile themselves to a Jewish state in the Middle East.

• Acting on information obtained from captured Hamas terrorist Hassan Salameh, the IDF arrested a large group of activists in the West Bank believed to be connected to extremist organizations. Hamas' military wing distributed a flier calling on Israel to release Salameh within seven days or else they will kidnap IDF soldiers and renew attacks against Israeli children.

May 21

• In response to a rumor that a secret agreement on the subject of Jerusalem exists with the Palestinians,Foreign Ministry Director General Uri Savir told Davar Rishon that he has never held negotiations on the issue of Jerusalem. "In all contacts with the Palestinians, we emphasized our explicit position, that Jerusalem will remain Israel's capital forever."

May 22

• A new military censorship agreement took effect today. It entitles the censor to "prevent the publication of security-related information certain to cause real damage to Israel's security." Political opinion and commentary will not be censored unless they contain classified security-related information.

Israel & the Jewish World

Campaign has been very odd

[Cont'd. from page 1]

"It's not only the content of the message that is blurred but the format," says Prof. Gabriel Weimann of Haifa University. "Both major parties have adopted an MTV style, in which the video clips change so rapidly that you don't know who said what anymore. In 30 seconds, you've gone from Bibi [Netanyahu] to Peres and back again."

The result? Most of the public don't watch the daily broadcasts of propaganda which represent the only chance to see politicians during the last month of the campaign.

That's because a law, which many call archaic, prohibits television and radio interviews with any politician on any topic during this period. (Reporters cannot even ask the finance minister whether a labor dispute has been resolved and broadcast the response without violating this law.) At peak popularity, 28 percent of the public watched the barrage of election commercials, and mid-way into the campaign, less than 15 percent were watching.

Unable to see politicians on the news, and uninterested in seeing them in MTV-style clips, the Israeli public has found another way to watch the candidates. Giant puppets depicting Israel's best-known politicians in a less-than-flattering light have become the real hit in this campaign. The puppets offer a new TV satire – based on the British show Spitting Image – that mercilessly lampoons all current and potential leaders. The program, called the HarZufim, is watched regularly by over a third of Israelis and provides an antidote to the blurred political messages of the official campaign.

Recent episodes showed Likud leader Netanyahu refusing to divulge the party platform even under torture, hawkish Likud MK Ariel Sharon plotting to invade Iran and Iraq and the late Yitzhak Rabin being paged in heaven to help the Labor party win the election! A recent study showed that Israeli children were better able to grasp the political ideologies of the various parties after exposure to the puppets than they were after watching the parties' political broadcasts.

If the politicians are not that persuasive, who will decide the elections? According to a Gallup poll published in the daily Ma'ariv, most Israelis believe that the outcome of the election hinges on terrorism. At present, 54 percent of those polled think Peres will win, while 27 percent believe Netanyahu will emerge victorious (irrespective of their own political preferences.)

But if terrorists strike prior to the vote, 46 percent think Likud will win and only 25 percent see a victory for Labor. The headline in Ma'ariv put it succinctly: "Hamas will decide the elections, according to the Israeli public."

"It's not that most voters will change their minds. Terrorist attacks tend to reinforce people's political views – whatever they are," explains Weimann, an expert in both communications and international terrorism. "But a few undecided voters will be influenced by terror. It's an emotional reaction. When the vote is split nearly 50-50, that's all you need to reverse the results of the election."

It wouldn't be the first time terror has been a factor in an Israeli ballot. In 1988, polls showed Labor with a slim lead over Likud until the day before the election, when a molotov cocktail was thrown at a bus in the Jordan Valley, killing a mother, her children and the soldier who tried in vain to save them. Analysts say the incident jarred enough voters to give Yitzhak Shamir a victory over Peres.

In 1992, the murder of Bat Yam teenager Helena Rapp sparked riots just before the June election, with protesters chanting for Rabin to come to power.

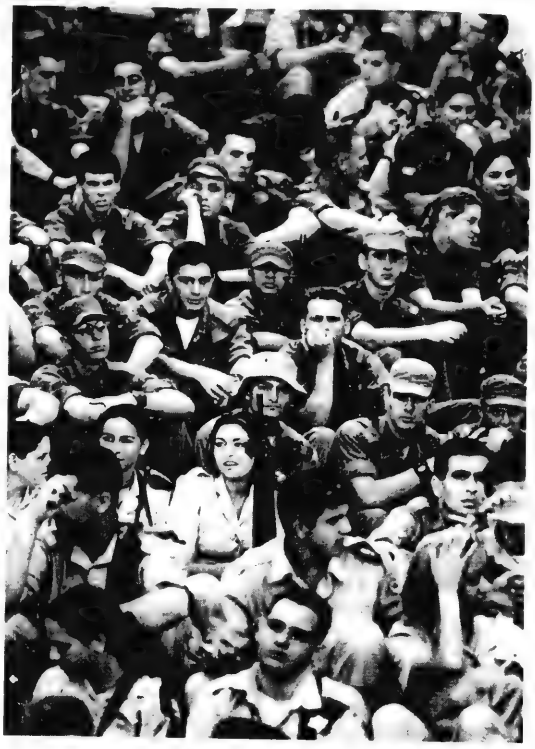
"The opposition – whichever party it is – always gains from terror attacks," says Weimann. "It's an opportunity to accuse the government of failing to protect citizens."

"Waiting for the next terror attack is like waiting for the other shoe to drop. It's terrifying," says new immigrant Ann Weissman, who will be voting for the first time. "It's disturbing that one act may decide the election and there's nothing you can do about it."

It is not only the closeness of the race that makes terror such an ominous threat in this election. "There have been terror attacks in other election campaigns. But never before have they been part of an intentional strategy to defeat a government and influence the outcome of the vote," notes Weimann.

It is no secret that Iran is interested in toppling the Labor government in the hope – perhaps a mistaken one — of halting the peace process. Army intelligence chief Maj.-Gen. Moshe Ayalon reached this conclusion in a report publicized last month. Islamic fundamentalist terror groups have openly declared this as their goal.

Prof. Ze'ev Maoz, director of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies, explained Iran's motive at a conference last week. Iran and its terrorist allies share one concern: that a breakthrough in Middle East negotiations will signal their demise as a force in the region, said Maoz.



THE DETAILS OF SECURITY

Election too close to call

security ever, with people afraid to go out of their homes or take buses for fear of a terrorist attack. Peres, he said,"has put the security of our children in Arafat's hands."

"Netanyahu is trying in vain to spread fear," Peres countered. "We are a nation which has fought wars and won them all and we will beat terrorism to achieve peace. There are those of little faith, who are building up hatred of Arabs and fear among Jews. Now there is a chance to obtain peace, and we will triumph over terrorism."

For the first time in the election campaign, the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, which shook the country six months ago, was broached.

"Rabin was murdered before my very eyes," said Peres. "Otherwise, he would have been sitting here instead of me. The messenger was slain, but not his mission: to establish true peace and growth."

He called on the voters "not to let the mission be stopped. Let us continue on with full force and courage, until we reach our destination, for the sake of the whole nation and especially for the younger generation."

Netanyahu said in his closing statement that Peres' way is leading to neither real peace nor security.

"We will ensure security, a free economy and growth, all of which are essential to peace. People keep coming to us all the time, because they believe in our way and because they want to ensure that our children don't live in fear."

He called on all the voters to "join us and, with the help of God, we will triumph."

Moderator Dan Margalit, pointing out that Peres is 73, asked him whether his age is not a liability.

"If we were electing a model rather than a prime minister, the question might be relevant," replied Peres. "My health is excellent and my thinking is that of a young man's ... There are people who are young in years, but their thoughts are old, facing the past and going backwards."

Margalit then asked Netanyahu whether his panicky behavior in the scandal widely known as the video cassette affair did not cast doubt on his ability to display cool judgment, which is required above all by the prime minister.

Without hesitation, Netanyahu admitted that his hasty decision to go public with his marital infidelity had been a mistake. But, he said, his mistake had caused pain to his wife and family, while Peres' mistakes are hurting the entire nation.

Costa Rica urged to expel alleged war criminal

By BRIAN HARRIS
Jewish Telegrapghic Agency

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica, - Calling his presence here a "travesty of justice," 72 members of the Israeli Knesset have called on Costa Rica to expel alleged war criminal Bodhan Koziy.

Joining in a campaign launched earlier this year by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Jerusalem, members of every party in the Knesset except the Arab Democratic party signed a letter to Costa Rican president Jose Maria Figueres asking that Koziy be declared a persona non grata and deported.

The letter was presented this week to Costa Rica's ambassador to Israel, Manuel Lopez.

Koziy, 73, a Ukrainian police official during World War II, has been accused of war crimes stemming from his collaboration with the Nazi occupation of Ukraine.

In 1982, Koziy, the owner of a Florida motel, was stripped of his U.S. citizenship. The U.S. Justice Department obtained a court order to deport him in 1984, but he fled to Costa Rica.

Officials in the former Soviet Union accused Koziy of killing Jewish children and their parents.

But he was never extradited there by Costa Rica because Soviet officials, saying that they had no influence over Ukrainian courts, could not promise Costa Rica that Koziy would not face the death penalty.

The Knesset letter is the first from Israeli legislators regarding Koziy.

But it is not intended to disrupt the normally cordial relations between Costa Rica and Israel, said Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Centre's Jerusalem office.

"No one is saying Costa Rica is a bad place," he said. "It's just that we have this one problem."

Figueres and Foreign Minister Fernando Naranjo were in Taiwan this week on an official state visit and could not be reached for comment.

Both have said Costa Rica would not unilaterally expel Koziy, but would study an extradition request.

No country has recently expressed an interest in seeking his extradition.

Rep. Michael McNulty (D-N.Y.) personally handed a letter signed by 60 other congressmen to Figueres that said, "Judges in the United States and prosecutors in Germany affirmed that Koziy was a Nazi policeman in Ukraine, where he shot and killed — amongst others — a 4-year-old."

In June 1994, the World Jewish Congress began a campaign to oust Koziy from Costa Rica.

But the campaign subsided after reports from Kiev indicated that the sole surviving witness against Koziy had recanted her story.

Arabs hurt in Jewish riot

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Hundreds of Jewish worshippers went on a rampage in the Old City last Friday morning, attacking Arab bystanders and damaging Arab property, following all-night prayers for the Shavuot holiday at the Western Wall.

"The rioting was unprovoked, and we still haven't figured out what motivated it," Jerusalem Police spokesperson Shmuel Ben-Ruby said.

The rioters broke windows and damaged merchandise at stores just inside Damascus Gate. They also turned over vendors' stalls and pushed and shoved Arab bystanders. Many merchants quickly closed the shutters on their stores to avoid damage. Ben-Ruby said no injuries were reported.

The Jewish rioters also threw stones at Arab vehicles on Sultan Suleiman Street, outside Damascus Gate. About 25 complaints were filed with police for damage caused by the rioting, representing only a small number of the actual instances, Ben-Ruby said.

The unrest caught police by surprise, coming after a quiet all-night study-and-prayer service at the Western Wall, attended by thousands.

The vandalism broke out about 8 a.m., as a crowd of worshippers leaving the Western Wall made its way through the Old City.

Dozens of police were called to the scene and clashed with the rioters. There were no arrests.

Police sources said the rioting was apparently provoked by a group of right-wing Jewish extremists in the crowd of worshippers, who began attacking Arab targets.

Hamas leaders meet with Arafat

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Hamas officials have resumed the meetings with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat that were interrupted by the suicide bombings in February and March, but no reconciliation agreement between Hamas and the PA has been reached, a Hamas spokesperson said last week.

Sayed Abu Musameh, a former newspaper editor, was responding to a report in the daily Hayat al-Jadida, which said Hamas and the PA had reached a draft agreement normalizing relations between them.

He confirmed he had been at a recent meeting with Arafat, that was also attended by Hamas officials Sheikh Hassan Shama and Dr. Mahmoud Zahar, who was recently freed from Gaza jail after he was arrested during a PA crackdown in March.

Seeking reconciliation

The paper said that the three, who met earlier with Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, who is jailed in Israel, delivered a letter from Yassin to Arafat giving his blessings to the alleged draft agreement.

In an Israel Television interview three weeks ago, Yassin expressed his acceptance of Arafat's leadership. He also accepted the Palestinian National Council's right to amend the Palestinian Covenant, and said he could accept an agreement between Israel and the PA that provided for two states.

"We should live next to Israel," he said. However, he did not condemn violence against Israel.

Since then Zahar has publicly called for ending attacks, at least until Wednesday's elections.

Arafat has left three ministerial posts open, apparently hoping to get Hamas figures to join the Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian sources say that a rift has developed between Hamas figures who favor working within the PA and those who want to keep opposing it. The latter have support from radicals abroad.

Snoring may indicate more serious health problems

By MELINDA GREENBERG
Baltimore Jewish Times

BALTIMORE, Md. – Beverly Sallese and her husband Carl are sleeping together again.

Sallese, a 47-year-old accountant, drove her husband out of their bedroom with her snoring. "There were times when he would go in the other room and have to close the door to shut out the noise," she said."

For a year, Sallese tried every home remedy and non-invasive treatment suggested by her doctor, Carl Patow, an ear, nose and throat specialist and associate professor of otolaryngology at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, but nothing worked.

Finally, Patow suggested laser-assisted uvulopalatoplasty (LAUP), a surgical technique created in France in the late 1980s that has been used successfully in Baltimore for the last three years.

Despite some discomfort during the two-week recuperation period after her surgery last July at the Johns Hopkins University Sleep Disorder Centre, Sallese is thrilled with the results.

Guy Avellon, 28, a regional sales manager from Roland Park, also tried all possible non-invasive techniques, including a mouth guard, before deciding on LAUP. Despite experiencing "the worst sore throat ever" during his recuperation, Avellon also recommends the procedure.

Avellon was operated on by Dr. Alan Oshinsky, an ear, nose and throat doctor and the director of the Mercy Sleep Diagnostic Centre, in Baltimore's Mercy Medical Centre. "My snoring is relatively gone, even when I sleep on my back," he said.

Snoring occurs when air can't flow freely through the passage in your throat. While you sleep, structures in the throat partially block the air passage, making the passage narrow and hard to breathe through. As the air from the nose or mouth passes around this blockage, the throat structures vibrate, causing the snoring.

In LAUP, doctors enlarge the air passage, using a laser to remove all or part of the uvula, a long flap of tissue that hangs from the soft palate. Some of the soft palate is also removed. The procedure is performed in a doctor's office under local anesthesia. For best results, it is usually done between three and five times, although some people only need it done once.

According to the American Academy of Otolaryngology-Head and Neck Surgery Inc., one out of every four people is a habitual snorer. The problem is more common in men and the overweight and worsens with age. And it has been around for centuries.

"There is mention of the Egyptians poking their king with needles to keep him from snoring," said Brian Emery, assistant professor of surgery in the otolaryngology division at the University of Maryland Hospital, who performs several procedures to treat snoring, including LAUP and UPPP (uvulopalatopharyngoplasty), a more involved surgical procedure.

Besides the nuisance involved, doctors are concerned about other health problems to which snoring may be linked. It is one of the cardinal signs of a more serious health problem, sleep apnea, Oshinsky said.

"Eighty percent of the people who come to me for treatment of snoring have some degree of obstructive sleep apnea," he said. "The snoring may get them in the door, but it's the apnea that can be life-threatening."

Sleep apnea occurs when the throat is completely blocked and air can't flow to the lungs. Since the lungs aren't getting fresh air, the brain tells the body to wake up just enough to tighten the muscles and unblock the air passage. Breathing is restarted with a loud gasp.

The patient may not remember waking up several times each night, but will feel fatigue during the day and can experience related health problems, such as high blood pressure, heart attacks and strokes, Oshinsky said.

Doctors look for problems such as allergies, nasal defects or extra weight to possibly explain the snoring before they decide if surgery is an option. A sleep test might then be performed to determine if the patient has sleep apnea.

If the sleep test reveals sleep apnea, doctors do not perform LAUP. Instead, they recommend one of several available air pressure devices, such as continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP), a small blower attached by a flexible hose to a soft, plastic mask. It's placed over the person's nose at bedtime. The blower sends a steady stream of air through the nose into the throat, keeping the throat structures from collapsing and blocking the airways.

Doctors often refer patients to their dentists, who can design oral devices to hold the tongue forward and keep it from blocking the throat, or move the jaw slightly forward, moving the throat structures and unblocking the air passages.

If all else fails, doctors might recommend surgery, such as UPPP, in which the uvula, part of the soft palate and the tonsils are removed.

Doctors report a 50 percent chance of having half as many apnea episodes after this procedure, according to Dr. Joshua Aaron, co-medical director of Sinai's Sleep Lab with Mishkin. UPPP is done in the hospital under general anesthesia and requires a two-day stay.

Doctors recommend trying the non-invasive techniques before even considering surgery. Some of the patients interviewed said they spent several years experimenting with different home remedies and dental devices before opting for the surgical approach.

Diabetes chapter marks 10th year

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Esther Schwartz was diagnosed with diabetes 14 years ago, she found it particularly difficult to stick to her diet during Jewish holidays and at simchahs.

"Pesach was the worst because you're so limited with your starches. You can only have matzah and potatoes," said Schwartz, a kosher food consultant for the Orthodox Division of Canadian Jewish Congress.

She began to realize that other Jewish diabetics were probably experiencing similar problems and she set out to form a Jewish chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association (CDA). The first meeting drew 200 people, Schwartz said.

This month, the chapter celebrated its 10th anniversary. About 140 people attended a special meeting which included speeches by some of the founders and CDA staff. Dr. Michael Shea, an ophthalmologist at St. Michael's Hospital, gave a lecture on current treatments for diabetic eye disease.

Schwartz thanked Dorothy Zeifman; Alan Shefman, a former board member of the CDA; and Mary Buchanan, a former executive director of the CDA for their work in establishing the chapter.

Its purpose is to provide a forum and education for the diabetic community as well as to raise funds for diabetes, Schwartz said. Since the establishment of the Jewish chapter, four other Toronto ethnic communities — the Chinese, Portuguese, Polish, and Italian — have started their own chapters.

The chapter invites medical experts from volunteer speakers' bureaus to lecture at the meetings held at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue every two months.

Between 75 and 100 people attend, Schwartz said. There are always pamphlets with dietary information and kosher recipes for upcoming holidays. Drug companies usually set up displays of new medical products.

Schwartz acknowledged the efforts of the other members of the chapter executive who include, Zeifman, Shirley Glatt and chapter president Alan Marks.

Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It is quite rare, I have found, to have an effective educational program that is also spiritually moving.

During the week of May 1 to 5, however, university students were privileged to experience both, at the National Jewish Student Leadership Convention run by the North American Jewish Student's Network — Canada, a group that unites Jewish student groups from across the country.

The delegates invited to the conference at the B'nai Brith resort in Quebec were student leaders of Hillels and other Jewish Student organizations.

During the conference, many issues were discussed, enabling us to explore ideas for various programs to be implemented in the future. We felt it important to consider both the number of students attending an activity and the quality of each individual program.

At the conference, members of the community who came to speak with the students included motivational speaker Ross Paperman and Jewish educator Arna Poupko, both from Montreal, as well as Jennifer Turack, the Ontario region director of community services and youth activities for Canadian Jewish Congress; and Yaakov Feig, staff member of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Federation. Rabbi Benjie Jacoby ran several helpful sessions, such as one titled, Anything and Everything You Ever Wanted to Know About Judaism But Were Too Afraid to Ask.

Besides the program-based sessions, we had the opportunity to get to know one another and to grow Jewishly. During Kabalat Shabbat, many students were struck by the beauty of the welcoming, and at the Shabbat meal, the students sang Hebrew songs and danced.

Describing the feeling of most participants, one student said of the conference, "Not only are we bringing something back to our communities, we are also bringing something back to ourselves."

It is possible that Network's funding may end in June. This is viewed as unfortunate both for those students who were part of this conference and for those members of Jewish student groups who can benefit from the programs developed at the conference. For many years, Network has served as a link between the voices of Jewish leaders from campuses around the country.

Rather than mourning the possibility that this link may be destroyed, the students at the conference decided to try to solve the problem on their own. The student leaders broke off into four regions of Canada: Western, Central, Eastern and Atlantic. Within each region, joint programming for the campuses in that area will be established. As well, one person from each region will be chosen as a delegate who will join the delegates in the other regions.

This will make it possible for us to continue to link the voices of Jewish students from across Canada through various means, via newsletters, the Internet and meetings. We will implement parallel programming, such as nation-wide Shabbat dinners and trips to Holocaust memorial centres.

Network representative Lori Binder said this group of students is a "strong cohesive group of great leaders that will continue to be leaders in the Jewish community." Although the work of this national group will not be easy to support without funding, the students are confident that they will make it work.

"Network was never able to do this before," said Network chair, Bena Medjuck, of the changes that the students are hoping to implement. A group of new faces with fresh ideas will alter this national organization and, through them, kol hastudentim, the voice of students, will be heard.

Worldwide demand for fur continues to grow

The fur trade is healthy, thriving in a new worldwide demand for its product. Colder winters, new fashion and design techniques, and more widespread use of fur trim are all factors contributing to this expanding industry..

The large population base in Russia and the Far East have also put extreme pressure on the world supply of ranched mink and wild furs. "This new demand has caught the fur trade by surprise," says Dan Kahnert, President of Kahnert Furs on Avenue Rd. "The industry has allowed the supply of ranched mink and fox to decline, and it's not as though fur farms can simply turn the tap on to increase production. It will take 2 to 3 years to bring production back to the levels of the late '80's."

Consistent cold weather has reinforced the demand for the natural comfort of warm fur. "The cold weather this past winter started in November and continued through to the end of April," says Mr. Kahnert. "I have never seen so much fur on the streets of Toronto."

To suit their consumers' changing lifestyles, Kahnert Furs brought in a quality line of lightweight shearlings and fur-lined microfibre coats and jackets. "By diversifying our product mix, we have been able to offer our customers not only a unique selection of natural and dyed furs, but also a fashion choice that suits every occasion."

Kahnert Furs' knowledgeable professional staff provide full service and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repair. Dan strongly recommends yearly cleaning of furs, and summer cold storage to prevent premature drying and preserve natural oils. At storage time, one of the Kahnert family examines every fur, and provides free estimates if repairs are needed.

Shock Absorber, Buy-Back Loan Protector

ROYAL BANK 3 ways to build a better car loan

Royal Bank's exclusive loan protection options cover you – your car – even your loan.

A Royal Bank car loan can be custom-built to your specific needs. This exclusive package of options is designed to ensure that you and your car go the distance together. And only Royal Bank has it.

1. Shock Absorber* Option.
Security for your car's first year.
If an accident means your car is a "write-off" during the first year. Shock Absorber can help to minimize the financial loss. It protects you from the depreciation most regular insurance companies may not pay. And adding Shock Absorber costs you nothing.

2. Royal Buy-Back® Option. Guaranteed value for the road ahead.
What will your new car be worth 3, 4 or 5 years down the road? With Royal Buy-Back, you have a guarantee of its future value - in writing.

It also allows you to reduce your monthly car loan payments if you so choose. And, for a limited time, it's available at no extra cost.

3. Loan Protector® Option.
For life's unexpected curves.
Loan Protector shields you and your family from a potentially devastating financial blow. Should you die. Loan Protector automatically pays the balance of your Royal Bank car loan. If you become disabled, Loan Protector makes your monthly car payments.

The car loan with built-in peace of mind.
Before you go shopping for a new car, talk over these options with a Car Loan Specialist at any Royal Bank branch. They'll answer your questions and give you all the details.

AVENUE ROAD

A leisurely stroll along Avenue Rd. unearths many interesting finds

You can find some of Toronto's most interesting boutiques, antique and interior design shops, galleries, restaurants and cafes on Avenue Road which stretches north from Bloor Street to Highway 401.

Avenue Road begins at the nexus of two shopping havens for the well-heeled: Yorkville and Hazelton Lanes and the enclave of exclusive shops in the Bay Bloor area. And it passes through some of Toronto's most elegant residential neighborhoods – Rosedale, Forest Hill up to North Toronto and the Cricket club.

Following Avenue Road north from Bloor one comes across a tiny retail strip between Bernard Avenue and Davenport Road on the west side of the street. It's home to Kay N Young, an exotic flower shop. On the opposite side of the street two blocks north is Roots Department Store located just south of Marci Lipman Graphics (231 Avenue Rd.)

Up the steep incline midway between Davenport and St. Clair you'll find Scaramouche , one of Toronto's best known restaurants. The Avenue Road Arts School is just south of St. Clair Avenue.

Continuing north of St. Clair, Avenue Road meanders through the residential neighborhoods of Forest Hill and Chaplin Estates intersecting with another enclave of specialty shops and boutiques at Eglinton Avenue. Up the hill through North Toronto, Avenue Road is residential until Lawrence Avenue.

Dotted with cafes & restaurants

This wonderful trendy shopping district, located between Lawrence and Wilson avenues, is dotted with cafes, boutiques, restaurants, hair salons, flower shops, jewellers, ladies' and men's fashion wear, antique and specialty stores, including travel agencies and businesses. It is also the headquarters of where Harvey Kalles Real Estate Ltd. is located. There is also plenty of parking available.

You don't have to worry about going hungry in this neighborhood. Here you'll find fine food stores which carry huge selections of gourmet foods, fresh produce, baked goods and other delectibles.

If you want coffee and a nosh or your favorite cold beverage, take your pick from the many cafes and pubs scattered throughout the area.

You'll find specialty shops like Ritche's, the bridal shop, Lager's Ladies Apparel, a better wear shop for regular size and larger women, Adele Wechsler, a better women's wear boutique and Nutcracker Sweet which offers gift baskets.

Other shops offering a variety of merchandise and home furnishings for the discriminating shopper include: Kahrnet Fine Furs, Royal Lighting, the Bunk House, as well as some wonderful specialty flower stores which help add color and fragrance to the Avenue.

So if you're looking for a shipping experience that offers both variety and elegance, or if you're in the market for a fine meal take a walk along Avenue Road. There's something for everyone.

Meeting your summertime lighting needs

Royal Lighting offers a huge selection of lights, fixtures and fans, with quality and variety to suit any budget, and styles which vary from contemporary to traditional. "We pride ourselves on our selection," says Royal's Michael Gladstone. "It is the best in the entire city."

With summer coming, you may be thinking about how to keep cool. Among Royal's 70 different models of ceiling fans, are brand names like Casablanca, Canarm and SMC. Prices range from $59.99 - $1,199.99, and these fans are covered by limited warranties ranging from 5 years to lifetime warranties.

Even on hot, humid days ceiling fans add a cooling breeze while helping to lower air conditioning costs. Prior to the invention of air conditioning, ceiling fans helped people feel more comfortable in the summer. Today, ceiling fans can work right along with your air conditioner to create maximum comfort while saving energy.

But - fans are not just for cooling. Because warm air rises, it becomes trapped near the ceiling to become wasted energy. During the winter months, by using the reverse setting on your ceiling fan the warm air on the ceiling is moved down to your living area. Because this evenly disperses the heat you can set your thermostat lower to save on energy costs.

Ceiling fans are definitely a valuable addition to your home.

Royal Lighting offers a wide selection of specialty bulbs, as well as bulbs by the case. This makes it easier for you to economize if you have a large number of pot lights in your home. For example, if you buy the bulbs singly, they cost $5.49 each, but by the case, the price for the same bulb works out to $3.99 each.

Royal carries hundreds of different kinds of lights, from crystal chandeliers for living or dining rooms to exterior lights for the house and garden. There is a vast selection to choose from in all price ranges, sizes, styles and colours: halogen and non-halogen; contemporary and traditional; table, floor, desk, wall, study and reading lamps. Royal's selection is huge enough to have a lamp or fixture to suit every need and taste.

Lampshades are sold separately and are on sale for 20% off at all times. If you have an old lamp that's still in good shape, but the shade has seen better days, bring in the lamp and find a new shade that suits it.

The approach of warm summer evenings may also make you want to look at Royal's selection of outdoor fixtures. Lighting for your yard has 2 benefits: security, safety and convenience at night; and a pleasant atmosphere for garden or lawn entertaining. There are low-voltage outdoor lights, garden lighting sets, and fixtures for your garage and front or back door.

With the right illumination, you can create the outdoor ambience you want in your yard or garden.

Royal Lighting offers both track and recessed lighting. Line voltage lights, which take halogen bulbs, are also available. So are low-voltage lights. As a low-voltage halogen bulb is smaller, the fixture itself can be smaller and less obtrusive.

The staff at Royal know the right questions to ask about your lighting needs, so that you go home with the product you want. Suppose you want a reading lamp for your study or home office: the staff will inquire about natural illumination from windows, brightness of wall colour, and other variables which affect the quality of light in the room, as well as your personal tastes in colour and style.

"We are a full-service store, not self-service," Gladstone emphasized. "If people are spending money, they want personal attention, whether their budget is lavish or modest." The staff at Royal are lighting experts, some of whom have worked in the lighting business for 20 years. Many are long-standing employees, some of whom have been with Royal since the store opening in 1981.

Royal Lighting is located at 1549 Avenue Road, call (416) 782-1129. Royal will ship anywhere.

Arts for Children of Toronto

Every child needs to shine. The Arts for Children Programs at the Avenue Road Arts School give each child this opportunity by presenting both exciting challenges in art, drama, music and writing and the skills to meet these challenges. A wide variety of classes are offered to children ages 3-18 including pottery, cartooning, painting, magic, acting for television, and creative writing.

When the children leave their classes they are glowing with pride and excitement. Small classes, highly trained teachers who 'take delight' in their students, and a joyful environment make it possible for girls and boys to discover that what they have inside themselves is truly valuable.

Avenue Road Arts School

Every adult needs to rediscover their creative side. Adults attending classes at the Avenue Road Arts School find it an artistic and spiritual oasis that fills a real need to be calm and to be expressive in a warm, supportive environment. The classes take place in a beautiful restored Victorian home where adults experience the freshness and spontaneity of the children's creations which cover the walls alongside their own work.

The average class size of 10-12 students allows for a great deal of individual attention from highly qualified instructors. The school offers a broad range of both traditional and unusual courses in all the arts including singing Broadway showtunes, home decorating arts, stand-up comedy, tapestry knitting, and journal writing. Students find that whenever they create they 'discover' themselves - the side of themselves they like the best.

Ritché 10 years on Avenue Rd.

It is so hard for Mr. Ritché to believe that it has been 10 years at the beautiful Avenue Rd. store. It seems like just yesterday that the 3 storey fashion boutique was being renovated to replace the previous Eglinton Ave. and Bloor St. locations.

Of course brides from all across Ontario know that Ritché is famous for fabulous wedding gowns and bridal party dresses. However, the residents in the Avenue Rd. district are still getting acquainted with Ritché. Those curious shoppers who just wander in are pleasantly surprised to find that we offer much more than beautiful evening wear. There is a great selection of business clothes, day wear, blouses, pant suits, leggings, jewellery, shoes and purses. The friendly and knowledgeable staff are always eager to show neighbours around the store.

Of course, if you should be fortunate enough to have a special occasion to attend, Ritché should be the first stop for your attire. The main floor has a gorgeous selection of gowns, beaded dresses, and suits in a surprisingly wide range of prices! Be sure to see the exclusive Ritché designs available to be custom designed just for you.

Singles Registry - over 1000 members strong

With new members registering in record numbers it has been an exciting winter and spring at the Jewish Singles Registry. That's the word from director Rob Singer who credits "word of mouth" advertising as playing a key role in the success; as current members tell their friends how fast and easy it is to connect with other Jewish singles. Membership has now surpassed the 1000 member mark.

THE CHOICE IS YOURS

At the J.S.R., there is an implicit understanding of how hard it is to meet interesting people. Your job takes up a lot of time, bar hopping is not your scene, and while the classifieds are great for selling cars, they are not ideal for "steering" you towards a partner. This is where the Jewish Singles Registry comes in - an attractive way to meet interesting and exciting people. Here you are given the opportunity to be pro-active, by taking control of your love life, and meeting people that you select. After reviewing detailed and comprehensive biography profiles, complete with photographs one gets a clear and concise picture of what your potential date will be like. You also have the freedom to be the selector, selectee, or both. So whether you are looking for someone to share a cup of coffee and a good conversation, or that special individual to possibly take a walk down the aisle, the J.S.R. makes it fun, safe and simple for you to make informed and quality dating choices. What more can you ask for?

THREE MORE ENGAGEMENTS

The J.S.R. is delighted to report that three more Registry couples have recently announced their intentions to get married. "When we say we are averaging an engagement every 7-1/2 weeks we are not kidding" reports Singer. "In fact we are expecting that average to improve even more by the end of this year."

SIX DAYS A WEEK

With today's hectic and often unpredictable schedules, the Registry is well aware how important it is to offer its' members long office hours so that registrants can use the service at their own convenience. Members can make appointments six days a week including evenings and Sundays. A professional and dedicated staff is always on hand to offer assistance.

TIME TO REGISTER

At the Registry we know how important it is to find someone to talk and laugh with and share life's ups and downs. We recognize how difficult it is to meet that special individual. Beverly Hills Caterers offers ambience, food and service: "Good things come in threes"

According to Beverly Hills Caterers' Raphy Amar, a premier caterer has three prime assets: ambience, food and service. To provide the best of each, he or she in turn must possess three qualities: honesty, meticulous attention to detail, and generosity.

Generosity means handsome-sized portions: enough food so that your guests can't imagine finishing it all, yet it's so good, it quickly disappears. It also means giving generously of your time, which Raphy gladly does to make every event a resounding success.

Le Parc, where Beverly Hills Caterers' head office is located, has six opulent banquet rooms, each boasting a skylit foyer with greenery, private bar and piano.

Raphy has 20 years' catering experience. Having spent some of these years as a chef, he keeps a constant eye on what's cooking, and imparts reality to the catchphrase "hands on". Le Parc's spotless new state-of-the-art kosher kitchen serves up to 2,000 guests. Raphy got his simcha planning experience hosting Hollywood celebrities for ten years as exclusive Kosher caterer to Beth Jacob, Los Angeles' largest Orthodox congregation.

In three years, Raphy has built Beverly Hills Caterers into a "one stop shop" for catering. Currently, he is offering a special, $55 p.p. for weekdays and $65 p.p. for weekends (plus 15% gratuities and 15% taxes; minimum 125 guests). This covers a five-course meal, including entrée, hors d'oeuvres and sweet table; it also includes open bar, coat check, linens, and parking. Each event has a $350 mashgiach charge.

Raphy's expertise is not confined to Le Parc; as of July 1, Beverly Hills Caterers will also be exclusive kosher caterer to Shaar Shalom Congregation in Thornhill.

Le Parc is currently offering extremely attractive prices to those who reserve Saturday night functions in advance for the period of January through March 1997.

Raphy is also looking forward to hosting the January 1997 Bridal Show at Le Parc. "It will be bigger and better than before," he promises, "with some of the most prestigious names in the business."

Beverly Hills Caterers offers cuisine from traditional Sephardic and Ashkenazi dishes to Italian and Oriental. Raphy is especially proud of his vegetarian and light California-style dishes and his sushi bar. Whatever your taste, Raphy can design a menu to suit your needs.

Beverly Hills Caterers is Glatt Kosher, under strict supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.). As a Shomer Shabbos caterer, Raphy closes Fridays at 2:00 p.m.

Beverly Hills Caterers is located at Le Parc, 8432 Leslie St. in Thornhill at Highway 7. You can reach Raphy at (416) 798-7246.

Simchas for up to 1,000 guests.

With plenty of elbow room.

Is there strength in numbers? When you're holding a big simcha at Le Parc, the answer is YES. We can comfortably — and we emphasize comfortably — seat up to 1,000 of your guests in one of our sumptuous dining halls, where they'll enjoy the finest Glatt Kosher cuisine prepared under strict supervision right on the premises by Beverly Hills Caterers.

Give us a call and we'll show you just how affordable true comfort can be.

Coles Catering Group: a Toronto tradition since 1847

For value-oriented clients, Coles Catering Group has been a Toronto tradition since 1847. Our new ownership is not only carrying on this tradition: we are constantly upgrading the quality of food and service. Whether your budget is modest or lavish: if you want value for your dollar, Coles is the caterer for you.

Let the experts at Coles Catering Group take the worry out of your entertaining. Coles offers you two service values: the personal touch of a professional staff, attentive to your wishes and requirements; and the confidence of dealing with an established company.

Whether for cocktails, dinner parties or buffets, we offer a wide choice of menus, to satisfy both the traditionally minded, and those in search of a culinary adventure. Among other delicacies, Coles Catering Group offers you our own pastries.

We specialize in home, backyard, country and cottage parties, and have a full mobile kitchen with special outdoor electrical equipment and appliances. With outdoor weddings becoming more and more popular, Coles is the company to meet your needs.

At the same time, we have a wide range of experience in all events, large or small, indoor and outdoor. Among the venues Coles has catered are Enoch Turner School, St. Lawrence Hall, the Garden Centre (Edwards Gardens), and the Design Exchange.

As full-service caterers, we can help with planning and management; besides linens and tablewear, we can help with decor; we will also supply staff. Or, if you prefer, we can simply deliver the food to you, ready to heat.

Coles is competitively priced, with complete meals starting at $29.95. Moreover, no party is too large or too small: Coles will cater for 2, or 2,000.

Call Patti Glasner for personal and professional assistance. Coles Catering Group is located at 366 Eglinton Ave. West, telephone: (416) 487-7777.

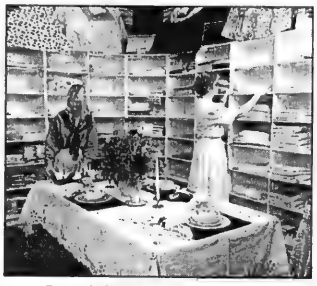
Deblins Linens a delight to the senses — and the pocketbook

Deblins Superstore at 39 Orfus Road is spacious and full of color. From floor to ceiling, pastels, primary colors and earth tones form lively contrasts with white and ivory. And if the bright fabrics and the clean, fragrant linens make Deblins a delight to your senses, the prices will do the same for your pocketbook.

The Chitiz family, with decades of experience in the linen trade, operates Deblins on the principle of maximum quality, variety and service at minimum cost — or, in President Ellis Chitiz' words, "boutique quality at warehouse prices". This policy works well: the Superstore is always busy, even at non-peak hours; at peak hours, customers crowd the aisles. "People like to come into a busy store," says Ellis.



Over 9,000 products in stock

Every Deblins item is a quality product. The throw rugs on the walls by the entrance, for example, with their tapestry-like pictures, are triple-woven 100% cotton. All three stores (in Toronto, Thornhill and Mississauga) carry the same merchandise at the same low prices — so low they don't offer designer discounts. "If you find a better price elsewhere," Ellis urges, "buy it; but nine times out of ten, taking price, quality and service together, no one is better than Deblins."

"Don't take my word for it," he adds. Ellis respects comparison shoppers and their ability to judge for themselves; the harder they are to convince, and the more they refuse to compromise on quality, the better. He asks only that when they search for better deals, they "compare apples with apples". Only for identical products does a price difference mean anything. This policy draws repeat business from customers who comparison shop as far away as Florida.

You can buy all your linens and accessories at Deblins; the selection comprises over 9,000 items. Ellis constantly expands the accessory selection, so that it becomes easier to co-ordinate bed linens with your ensuite bath linens.

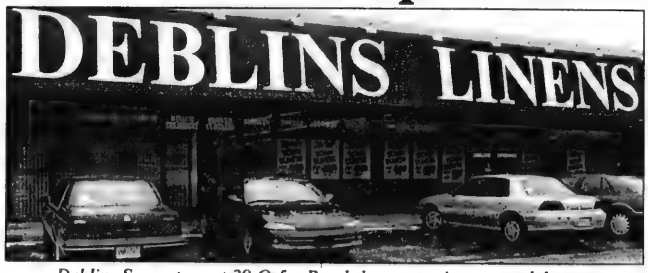
Fieldcrest Regency bath sheets are available for $9.99; so are cabana-striped Bobb bath sheets. All year round, tub mats are on sale for $5.99. There are fibre-reactive velour and terrycloth beach towels in strong reds, blues and greens, combining colorfastness with the contrast of soft and rough textures.

There is a wide assortment of ready-made curtains, valances and draperies to complement sheet designs, and drapery hardware to match, including wrought-iron rods in different colors with a variety of finials. New Kaleidoscope valance creators, which allow you to innovate in shaping the length and hang of draperies, regularly sell for $15.99; Deblins offers them for $6.99.

Deblins carries table linens for every occasion, whether for dinner parties, Shabbos dinner or informal meals; and there are table rounds, napkins, napkin rings, table pads and hundreds of dozens of assorted placemats. Visa no-iron, no-stain tablecloths come in ten sizes and 17 colors.

There are 18 bed settings, each in a vignette with matching bathwear and accessories, in price ranges and styles from simple to opulent — including a child's bunk with bright blue accessories, and huge reversible cushions with printed cartoons. Over the next two months, new sheet designs will be coming in from Revman, Croscill, Crowncraft, Revelle, Veratex, Burlington, Fieldcrest and Dan River. The Veratex, Crowncraft and Revelle lines are printed in Israel. Pillow covers, duvets, duvet covers, shams and bed skirts are well represented; and there are five different duvet styles, nine pillow styles, and sheets for odd-sized length, width or depth of mattress.

Deblins buys and ships all over the world,



Deblins Superstore at 39 Orfus Road: busy even in non-peak hours but offers boutique-style personal service. Staff answer questions promptly and expertly, on everything from fabric care to color co-ordination. In the unlikely event you don't find exactly what you want, Deblins will order it, or custom-make it at a good price in a few weeks' notice. "No problem" is the by-word here. Deblins also offers you the convenience of a Bridal Registry.

The Superstore at 39 Orfus Road is a few minutes north of Lawrence, west off Dufferin; call (416) 782-2910. The other stores are in the Promenade Mall in Thornhill, (905) 709-0007; and the Mississauga Home and Design Centre at the corner of Winston Churchill and Dundas, (905) 820-1509. All three locations are open seven days a week.

Spice Up Your Night Life

You spend one third of your life in bed, so why not make the most of it?

It's easy when you shop at Deblins Linens. We offer you a warehouse-full selection of high quality linens, duvets and pillows that will turn any bedroom into a beautiful, comfy retreat.

Bold colours, embellished patterns, distinctive stripes, whatever the fashion...you'll find all kinds of ways to dress up your bedroom at Deblins.

But we're not just great in bedding. We carry a full selection of table linens, towels, shower curtains and bath accessories.

Quality and value. It's the Deblins recipe. Visit us today for tasteful ideas that will add spice to your surroundings – day and night.

Nightmares haunt youth in Under the Domim Tree

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Under the Domim Tree* opens May 31 at the Carlton Cinema.

TORONTO – In Under the Domim Tree, the Israeli film that opens this week at the Carlton Cinema here, the setting is a youth aliyah village in Israel, circa 1950, whose teenaged residents have a lot more on their minds than the usual social concerns of adolescence.

Like many of the roughly 300,000 children orphaned in the Holocaust or in Arab-Israeli wars who grew up in youth aliyah villages, the young people in Under the Domim Tree are haunted by the nightmares of their pasts.

Unable or unwilling to tame their natures, two boys who survived the war by hiding in forests now run wild at night, howling like wolves.

By day, heated debates break out in the dining hall over whether to accept German reparation money: only one girl is in favor, arguing that the money could help her go to college.

After one girl, Yola, finds her missing father still alive, many of the others become obsessed that a similar miracle could bring back their parents. But a girl named Mira has a different problem. Having run away from Israeli parents who desperately claimed her as their own, she is adamant that a case of mistaken identity has been made. Concerning her actual parents, however, her memory is blank.

Each person in Under the Domim Tree has their particular source of grief and private pain, and the only place anyone can go to be alone is under the domim tree that stands on a hill, overlooking the village.

The film, which won first prize at last year's International Film Festival in Jerusalem, is based on the novel of the same name by Gila Almagor. Israel's first lady of film, Almagor based the book – as she did her earlier book, The Summer of Aviyah – on her own experiences.

Almagor appears in the film as the deluded, institutionalized mother of Aviyah, the only non-orphaned resident of the youth village. Although she was in Palestine during the war, Aviyah's mother has convinced herself that she was in Auschwitz, and obsessively inks numbers onto her arm to prove it.

In Toronto recently to promote the film, director Eli Cohen said that he searched many high schools and drama circles in Israel to find the right cast for Under the Domim Tree, as he did for its "prequel," The Summer of Aviyah, shot in 1988. Final casting decisions for Under the Domim Tree were made right up until one week before shooting began, he said.

"My job as director – apart from the obvious thing of discussing character with each and every actor – was to create an atmosphere that would bind them all together. Everyone came from a different place, a different village. It was really important to create this bond, this sense of togetherness, that you see in the film."

An important scene in the film occurs when a Dutch-born farmer experiments with agricultural techniques of the ancient Nabateans to grow a field of tulips beneath the domim tree.

"Everybody comes to me and says that the scene with the tulips blooming is symbolic," said Cohen. "They say that the delicate flowers from Europe that grow in the harsh desert sand are a symbol for the delicate children from Europe who also come here and bloom.

"When I hear this, I laugh to myself without denying it. I admit that it looks like a symbol, but it wasn't planned that way. The thing is, in films as in other forms of art, sometimes accidents happen and they can give new meaning to the work."

Cohen's other films include The Quarrel, which was made in Canada in 1992. Under The Domim Tree opens May 31 at the Carlton Cinema (416-598-2309).

Entrepreneur drops hostile take-over bid

By GALIT LIPKIS BECK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Hi-tech entrepreneur Davidi Gilo has decided to withdraw his hostile take-over bid for Scitex after failing to meet with the company's management and major shareholders to discuss the transaction.

In a letter written last week and addressed to the embattled, Herzliya - based company, Gilo said the group of investors he represents is willing to negotiate a deal, but its offer to buy Scitex stock at $25 (US) per share was no longer valid.

The Scitex-Gilo showdown started approximately seven weeks ago following Gilo's proposal to purchase Scitex at $20 per share.

After failing to receive a positive response, Gilo raised the price to $25, but this was also rejected by the company's major shareholders, who maintained it was not in the best interests of the company and its shareholders.

The company's major shareholders responded by buying more than one million Scitex shares on Wall Street, a move which Gilo said in his letter was coupled by the major owners' indications that they intended to continue purchasing Scitex shares "in order to thwart our proposal."

For its part, Scitex said that Gilo's withdrawal of his proposals, "which we believe were not in the best interests of Scitex and its shareholders," removes a distraction and will allow it "to focus on the important business of running the company."

The day following Gilo's announcement, all 13 nominees recommended by Scitex for its board of directors were elected at the annual shareholders meeting.

Scitex, which specializes in digital communication for graphic designs, completed the first quarter with a profit of $3.3 million (US).

Sotheby's Sale of Judaica: A wide range of silver, ritual objects, ketubot (marriage contracts), paintings, books and manuscripts are among the goods to be offered in a Judaica sale at Sotheby's New York, set for June 4.

Included in the collection of marriage contracts is an illustrated ketubah from Ragusza, Italy, dated 1781, which is expected to fetch at least $6,000 (US). Also for sale is an assortment of approximately 200 prayerbooks, rabbinic commentaries, codes of law, responsa, and books on philosophy and the Kabbalah from the collection of the late Dr. Israel Mehlman, a foremost collector of Hebrew books.

Among the paintings in the sale is Lazar Krestin's Im Bethaus, a fine oil painting depicting two boys, a young man and an elderly man at prayer inside a synagogue. The work is expected to fetch between $70,000 to $100,000 (US).

A painting by British artist Cyril Ross provides a startling contrast to Krestin's vision of religious devotion and dignity. Ross's painting is called Nazi Persecution and Sacrilege, and portrays a devastating attack on a synagogue during a pogrom, possibly Kristallnacht.

Jewish Film: The Toronto Jewish Film Society presents the Yiddish classic Yidl Mitn Fild (Yidl With His Fiddle) on June 2, 7:30 p.m., at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St. W., Toronto.

Molly Picon stars in Joseph Green's 1936 film as a young girl who poses as a boy so she can play her fiddle in her travels through the countryside.

Single tickets go on sale 15 minutes before showtime. Members are asked to show up by 7 p.m. to ensure a seat. Bill Emery, 416-924-6211.

Russian Dancers, An Update: Remember when a troupe of Russian dancers was stranded in Toronto four years ago? Thanks to their exceptional talent and showmanship, the dancers have been welcomed here by appreciative audiences and have done well for themselves.

Tenor Igor Portnoi has been signed on to the upcoming musical Ragtime, while Anna Shafajinskaia won a Pavarotti Voice Competition and is scheduled to sing with Luciano Pavarotti in a performance of Tosca in Philadelphia. Dimitri Fried, master gymnast, appeared in Miss Saigon, while Tatiana Zoubrilina and Oleg Kantemerov have worked as circus performers in the Moscow Circus and the Cirque du Soleil.

These and other accomplished members of the Russian Dance and Music Company present a gala variety show at the Leah Posluns Theatre, North York, for one night only, June 26, 7.30 p.m. Tickets are $15. 416-222-3758.

Sherman's Advance: The Factory Theatre of Toronto announced last week that it will present Hebron, a new work by playwright Jason Sherman, in its forthcoming season. In Hebron, a Toronto Jew engages his celebrity dinner guests (Noam Chomsky, Edward Said and Steven Spielberg) in an "unconventional inquiry" into recent events in the Middle East.

Sherman is the author of The Retreat, which enjoyed a sold-out run this past season at Tarragon Theatre. His earlier work, the Governor-General's Award-winning Three in the Head, Two in the Back, opened last week at the Manhattan Class Company Theatre in New York City.

Lazar Krestin's Im Bethaus is among the paintings in the sale.

In Brief: Pi, a bronze sculpture in four parts by sculptor Evan Penny, was unveiled last week at 220 Bay St., second floor, Toronto.

Vistas and Vegas highlight visit

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

SAN DIEGO, Calif. — The scenery is awesome, but eight different hotels in 12 days during a 1,100 mile bus tour in California, Utah and Arizona is a bit strenuous for seniors.

At least this writer and his wife, Fanny, found it so, as did some other seniors, but the majority of the 44 passengers took in stride the trip through hot desert climes to the much cooler temperatures of Zion National Park in Utah, and Bryce Canyon, Grand Canyon and Oak Creek Canyon in Arizona.

We started out in mid-March from Pasadena, Calif., spent two days in the never-never land of Las Vegas, which included the kind of night club floor show for which it is famous, then on to the canyons and Wild West ghost towns, one day each in the tropicl settings of Scottsdale and Palm Springs, ending with two days of sunning and swimming in San Diego. Then by the scenic Amtrak Sante Fe train to Los Angeles, not part of the tour, and home by air from there, in time for Passover.

It was strictly shorts weather in Las Vegas, Scottsdale, Palm Springs and San Diego, but in Cedar City, Utah, Page and Flagstaff, Ariz., it was time for warm sweaters and jackets. Nestled at the base of Grand Canyon, Flagstaff brings a sharp reminder of that old devil winter.

Our companions included 15 from the British Isles, 10 Canadians, one each from Spain, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and the rest from United States. The British types were the most adventursome of all, taking the helicopter and fixed-wing aircraft flights over and into the Grand Canyon.

It was a dramatic change to leave the fleshpots of Las Vegas and come face to face with the towering mountains of Zion National Park where our rustic room in the main lodge had no telephone, TV or radio.

Though Las Vegas and the canyons seem a strange mixture, for two travellers like ourselves who had never seen Las Vegas, it was a worthwhile experience, as we didn't play at the gaming tables. We were certainly close to them —you can't even go to breakfast in your hotel without passing through rows of slot machines and blackjack tables.

It's true that the casino operators are so intent on keeping your mind on gambling that in any public area of the hotels you can't tell whether it's night or day outside. There are no clocks. Gambling goes on 24 hours a day. The price of good meals is ridiculously low.

It was surprising to see how many families with children in their own vehicles were following the same trail as our bus. Evidently March break holidays are a big

Film tells Prisoner 88's story

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sigmund Sobolewski, a Canadian Catholic survivor of Auschwitz, says his fight to keep alive the memory of the Jews who died there has wrecked his family life. He says Ramona, his Cuban wife of 30 years, "feels the Jews are stealing me away."

He reveals this in the 48-minute Ark film Prisoner 88, directed by David Paperny, being given its TV premiere on TVOntario June 5 and 9 at 10 p.m.

Prisoner 88 is the story of a 73-year-old man dressed in striped pyjamas, who has an Auschwitz number tattoed on his left forearm. He demonstrates in front of Polish embassies and consulates in Canada and the United States, complaining that Auschwitz is being "Christianized."

"The Christians were guilty for what happened at Auschwitz," he says in the film. "We all need to seek redemption. Where was the church, where was the Pope, where was the world when it happened?"

Sobolewski was one of those who raised the alarm about a private developer's plan to build a shopping mall across from the camp. The worldwide revulsion on discovering the plan led the Polish government to halt it.

Though he doesn't agree with some of the methods Sobolewski uses to attract attention, Nathan Leipciger, of Toronto, the Canadian delegate to the Auschwitz International Council, told The CJN he agrees with his objectives.

In Prisoner 88, Sobolewski says that when he dies, he wants his ashes strewn in the pond near the crematorium at Birkenau (part of Auschwitz) "to be with the ashes of my sisters and brothers of the Hebrew faith."

"I raise my arms to the sky and I hear Jewish souls crying out: 'Sigmund, what are you doing for us? We are forgotten,' " he says in the film's final scene, as he breaks down and weeps.

Prisoner 88 traces the Polish-born Sobolewski's life through 4½ years at Auschwitz; a brief stint in the Polish merchant navy; his time in Cuba, where he married Ramona; their arrival in Canada, where he worked in the Maritimes, in Toronto and out west as an engineer; and finally his purchase of a hotel and pub in Fort Assiniboine, Ata.

They were forced to sell the hotel because of unpaid bills, he says, and they moved to Calgary. Their three grown-up sons, he claims, are alienated from him.

In Prisoner 88, Ramona says, "I want my husband back. He is not the man I knew."

One scene, filmed in Auschwitz, shows Sobolewski in striped pyjamas, carrying a sign about Christian guilt, being taunted by a Polish camp visitor.

Sobolewski revisits Birkenau, where he recounts the story of the four Jewish heroic women who smuggled arms to other prisoners, who then rioted and sabotaged one of the crematoriums.

As a member of the camp fire brigade, Soboleski was sent to the scene. He also revisits the room where he saw a Jewish prisoner brutally treated by a Kapo, a Jewish prison guard.

He admits he was suspicious of Jews when, as a Polish officer's son, he was first arrested and sent to Auschwitz. What he saw the Jews endure there transformed his life.

His searing memories of Auschwitz made him a cantankerous tavern keeper who was wont to argue with the drinkers and boot them out, a customer says in the film. Though Sobolewski claims his sons are alienated, one declares: "He taught us how to survive another Auschwitz," and another says, "I'll tatoo 88 on my left forearm. I'm proud of what he did."

A shortcoming in Prisioner 88 is its failure to connect Sobolewski with the wider context of Holocaust denial he is fighting or his warm reception by the Jewish and Christian groups across Canada who have heard his story.

thing in the United States too. The indoor pools at Page and Flagstaff were as warm with frolicking kids. The walking paths at Montezuma Castle National Monument and at Grand Canyon were busy and crowded.

Here's another tip: If you are counting on a shuttle to get to L.A. airport from downtown L.A. (the Amtrak station for instance) allow extra time because the freeways to the airport can be bumper to bumper. Besides that, the shuttle sometimes make unannounced stops on the way to the airport (at UCLA for example) so remember you must arrive 30 minutes early for an international flight to claim your seats.

Jewish baseball stars could field their own team

By RICHARD REEDER
Special to The CJN

CHICAGO —If an all-time Jewish major league baseball team were to take to the field today, it could slug it out with the best of 'em.

Of course, the team would have two Hall of Famers in its lineup — Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax — and it would also have Buddy Myer, who, it can be argued, had the statistics to warrant a place in Cooperstown as well.

The team's starting lineup is strong at the plate — it doesn't have a hitter with a career average of less than .281. Four of the eight starting postion players (Greenberg, Toronto's Goody Rosen, Sid Gordon and Morris Arnovich) had their careers shortened by World War II.

The pitching staff's starting five collected four Cy Young Awards, hurled six no-hitters and tossed 130 shutouts in their collective careers. They had a composite 718 wins, 505 losses and a .587 winning percentage.

Taking a trip around the diamond, the first stop is first base, manned by Hank Greenberg. Greenberg amassed 331 homers and 1,276 RBIs while batting .313 in 12 years of play between 1933 and 1947. He wore a Detroit Tigers uniform in all but one of those years, but he closed out his career with a single season playing for the Pittsburgh Pirates.

A two-time MVP, he led the American League in home runs and RBIs four times. In 1938, he hit 58 homers, reaching the mark with five games left in the season. Try as he might to eclipse Babe Ruth's 1927 record of 60, he didn't hit another that year.

The second baseman is Buddy Myer, who batted .303 in 17 seasons between 1925 and 1941. Myer played 16 of those years with the Washington Senators.

Andy Cohen, who like Myer played both second and short, takes the field as the team's shortstop. Cohen batted .281 over three years with the New York Giants in the late 1920s. He also managed the Philadelphia Phillies for one game in 1960, making him only one of two Jews to have managed in the majors. Norm Sherry was the other.

Al Rosen, a certifiable slugger for the Cleveland Indians from 1947-56, mans third base. Rosen posted strong lifetime numbers as he hit for a .285 average, belted 192 homers and drove in 717 runs.

The left-fielder, Goody Rosen, batted .291 in six seasons for the Dodgers and Giants. Rosen knocked out 11 triples in both the 1938 and 1945 seasons.

Sid Gordon, who played for the Giants, Braves and Pirates from 1941-55, is the team's centre-fielder. This .283 lifetime hitter had considerable pop in his bat as he clouted 202 roundtrippers and 805 ribbies.

Completing the outfield is Morrie Arnovich in right. A career .287 hitter, Arnovich split his playing time with the Phillies, Reds and Giants. His best year was in 1939 with Philadelphia, when he batted .324.

Catching duties go to Harry Danning, a solid .285 hitter for the Giants from 1933-42. A defensive fixture for the New Yorkers, Danning was a favorite receiver for Hall of Famer Carl Hubell.

The starting pitching staff is led by the great Sandy Koufax, who won three Cy Young Awards and threw four no-hitters in his glory days with the Dodgers from 1955-66. Koufax won 165 games while losing 87, a .655 percentage.

He posted a remarkable .95 ERA in 57 World Series innings and became a cause celebre for refusing to pitch the opening game of the 1965 World Series because it fell on Yom Kippur. However, he was the winning pitcher in Game 7 against the Twins.

Ed Reulbach makes an impressive second starter. Reulbach, who pitched in the majors from 1905-17, spent his first nine years with the Cubs. He was a big righty with a lifetime record of 181 wins and 105 losses. Big Ed, who was on four Cub pennant winners, tossed 40 shutouts and had a career ERA of 2.28.

The starting staff also includes southpaw Ken Holtzman, who pitched from 1965-79, mostly with the Cubs and the Oakland A's. In 1969 and 1971, Holtzman hurled no-hit games for the Cubs. Overall, the classy lefty won 174 games while losing 150.

Steve Stone, who threw in the majors from 1971-81, is the fourth starter. A crafty righthander, Stone saw service with the Cubs and White Sox as well as the Giants and Orioles. He recorded a 25-7 season with the Orioles in 1980, which earned him the Cy Young Award.

Erskine Mayer completes the starting rotation. A righthander who pitched in the second decade of the century, Mayer won 21 games in both the 1914 and 1915 seasons for the Phillies. He ended his career in Chicago playing with the 1919 "Black Sox," but was unaffected by the scandal.

The team's reserve players include first basemen Mike Epstein, Ron Blomberg and Phil Weintraub, catchers Moe Berg and Joe Ginsberg and outfielders Cal Abrams and Art Shamsky. Completing the pitching staff are Larry Sherry, Saul Rogovin, Harry Eisenstat, Barry Latman and Bo Belinsky.

Second baseman Myer's statistics should place him in the Hall of Fame. Compare his career numbers to those of Hall of Famer Billy Harman: Mayer played 1,923 games, Harman 1,922; Harman's batting average was .304, Myer's was .303; Myer scored 1,174 runs, Harman 1,163; Myer had 850 RBIs, Harman 839.

Harman did have about 200 more hits, but Myer had about 200 more bases on balls. Harman outpaced Myer in doubles, 486-353, but Myer hit 130 triples to Harman's 82 and Myer's 156 stolen bases far exceeds Harman's 67.

The commemorative glass the groom breaks under the chupah and the symbol for us to remember the destruction of the Temple. Now a memory to be held forever embedded and encased inside an acrylic mold.
A cherished gift, a SUSPENDED TREASURE...
Prices start at $175 for the broken bulb encased inside of a Star of David and range to $205 if an actual glass kiddush cup is used under the chupah.

PECAN CRISPY CHICKEN

8 chicken breasts, boned
1/2 cup flour
salt and pepper to taste
6 tblsp Dijon mustard
3/4 cup melted pareve margarine
2 tblsp lime juice
1 egg, beaten
1 1/2 cups finely chopped pecans
1 1/2 cups fine bread crumbs
1 lime, sliced

Pound chicken breasts between 2 layers of wax paper with mallet or cleaver until flat. Dredge in seasoned flour. Whisk mustard. Add pareve margarine, lime juice and egg. Whisk until well mixed. Dip breasts in sauce. Combine pecans and bread crumbs and coat chicken pieces. Cover with wax paper and chill 1-2 hours. Heat oven to 350°. Place chicken on cookie sheet and bake 35-45 mins. Serve with a slice of lime on each piece of chicken.

About people

Dear Ella,

My friend Janice and I have grown up together. We have the same tastes, the same ideas and the same values. The only thing we can't seem to agree on is her smoking.

We both smoked as teenagers, but I quit just before I got pregnant with my first child. Janice never did quit. She smoked through three pregnancies and continues to do so. Both she and her husband are smokers and their house reeks of smoke and so do their children. Her youngest child is asthmatic and she refuses to admit that there is a possibility that it could be aggravated by her smoking.

I should add that Janice is an intelligent woman. She has a university education and besides raising a family, she has managed to start a small successful business. With all the data out on secondhand smoke, I am finding myself reluctant to let my children visit her home. This has been the cause of many arguments between us. Do you have any answers for me?

No Smoking Please

Dear No Smoking Please,

Smoking is very definitely an addiction. It has a physical, habitual and emotional hold on many people. Some people obviously find it either easier or more important to quit than others. Your friend is not alone. There are many people who even with the greatest motivation still cannot seem to kick the habit.

I have a friend who watched and nursed her mother through lung cancer and swore she would never smoke, but she smoked right through the shiva and continues to smoke today.

You would think that having a child suffering with asthma would also be enough of a motivation to quit smoking, but it is a strong addiction and not for you to judge.

You have been friends for a long time and should continue, however you are correct in being concerned about the secondhand smoke your children are exposed to at her home. There has been much research done to prove the harmful affects of second hand smoke. Just to quote from one report, The American Lung Association states "Secondhand smoke has been classified by the Environmental Protection Agency as a known cause of cancer in humans. Secondhand smoke is especially harmful in young children."

Keep the kids playing either outdoors or at your home. There is nothing wrong with telling her how you feel. Just as Janice has every right to smoke, you and your children have every right not to be exposed to it.

Remember how far back your friendship goes and don't let this problem come between you. With a little respect and understanding on both sides your friendship will continue for many years to come.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

מבחינת הביקורת והשקפתה על הספרות העכשווית, יתכן וניתן לעשות את החלוקה הבאה: כשרון ללא חזון, כשרון וחזון. דעת רוב המבקרים היא שהספרות סובלת מפער רציני בין רמת כתיבה גבוהה וחסך באידיאלים לאומיים, בין כשרון ספרותי והעדר חזון ציוני. הטענה היא שהקולות החדשים בספרות העברית מתמקדים בנושאים בעלי תוכן אוניברסאלי בלבד. השאלות המטרידות סופרים במשמרת זו הן בעיות היומיום של היחיד, הומניים קוסמופוליטי. בולט הניכור מהחזון הציוני-יהודי. אלמלא נכתבו יצירות הגל החדש בעברית, לא היינו יודעים שמדובר בספרות יהודית. דעה אחרת באה לידי בטוי בנימוקי השופטים לבחירת הזוכים בתחרות הסיפור הקצר של "הארץ" שנערכה לאחרונה. השופטים הביעו שביעות רצון מן הרמה הכללית של הסיפורים (שמונה מאות סיפורים הוגשו לתחרות) וציינו לשבח את תוכנם הציוני. סיפורים רבים הם על ימי המנדט, ימי הגולה חיפשה נוסח ברדיצ'בסקי, או על ימי החלוצים. גבוה היה גם שיעורם של סיפורים על בית ומשפחה מנקודת היבט ישראלית מובהקת. רבים מן הסיפורים הטובים, כך ציינו השופטים, היו כתובים על רקע החברה החדשית.

ובכן, על-פי שלושת המדדים לבחינת איכותה של ספרות: לשון, תוכן וביקורת, אין ווכוח על כשרון הכתיבה, אלא שיש נינגדי דעות באשר להיבט היהודי/ציוני.

"הכוונה לספרות שעדיין מתבשת מהמחצית השניה של שנות השמונים, להבדיל מסופרי תש"ח וסופרי גל שנות השישים והשבעים.

(במדור "ספרותנו" חבא: "למאטים יש את משמש בבטן" פאת ערדית קציר.)

בשלושה מדדים נבחנת הספרות הישראלית העכשווית: בלשון, בתוכן ובקורת הספרות.*

בתחום הלשון, העברית בספרות היום מאוכלסת במלים שימושיות, תכליתיות, חלקן בלועזית. לעומתן, נערמות מלים שמזה שנים לא נעשה בהן שימוש והן הוזכרו לאיבוד. על רקע זה יצאו לאור בארץ לאחרונה שני לקסיקונים. האחד, "מילון המלים האובדות" מציין מלים שפעם היו בשימוש ושוב אינן. הלקסיקון השני, "לקסיקון לועזי עברי", מפרט מלים לועזיות, שימושיות שנקלטו בשפה העברית.

יש שתופעת המלים הלועזיות צורמת להם. אחרים, רואים בתופעה דבר מקובל. תחיה הגישה אשר תחיה, הלעז מבצבץ למכביר בספרות העברית של היום.

מבחינה תכנית, התמונה מורכבת. עוצמה ואיכות - יש ויש. השפע מרגש ומעורר גאווה; זה "שלנו". ישראלים מוכשרים שכאלה! ואולם יש גם שפע של אשפה ספרותית. כתיבה נטולת תחכום, שיותר מכל מאפיין אותה חמרכיב הוולגרי. נסיונות לטשטש חסר בעמקות ובינה בניבול פה וגסות (בר"כ מינית). בין הכשרון והאשפה יש גם כמה סימני שאלה. יצירות ביניים שבהן מצוי כשרון אבל גם חוסר תחכום כמעט מעליב. למשל "ענגועי לקסינגר" מאת: אתגר קרת. סיפורים קצרצרים שנבלעים בחסף ובמריבתם חדות ראיה והומור קדר. ובכל זאת, עלה תחושת חריקנות חסרותית במחלך הקריאה.

כללית, מבחינה טכנית ויכולת כתיבה, את סופרי הגל החדש מאפיין ריכוז בלתי רגיל של כשרונות הניכרת כבר בפרסום ביכורי יצירותיהם.

Netanyahu calls for unity

BY HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In a gracious victory speech, prime minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu Sunday night extended a hand of conciliation to the half of the country that voted against him, calling on everyone to bind the wounds.

He extended another hand of conciliation to Arab leaders, calling on them to continue to walk down the path of peace.

"The State of Israel is going forth today on a new path," Netanyahu told a euphoric crowd of thousands of supporters at the Jerusalem International Convention Centre, "a path of hope, a path of unity, a path of security, a path of peace. The first and foremost peace that must be reached is peace at home, peace between us, peace among us."

Netanyahu's 30-minute speech, his first public statement since the election, was interrupted by deafening chants, ranging from "He is great, he is great, he is great," to "Bibi, king of Israel."

Election was laden with ironies

By SHIRA HERZOG
Special to The CJN

Commentary

As the final votes were being counted, a new era in Israeli politics was already beginning. Direct elections of the prime minister have had far-reaching results that have reshaped the Knesset.

Both large parties – Labor and Likud – have lost considerable strength to the smaller parties on the left and right. These, in turn, benefited from the split vote of many Israelis, who gave their prime ministerial vote to one of the two key candidates while they voted for single-issue parties for the Knesset.

The ironies in the situation are not lost on many Israeli observers. In 1992, when comprehensive electoral reform was brought to a vote in the Knesset, Labor and Likud failed to pass the first half of the bill, which would have changed the system from one of proportional representation to a mixed, proportional and constituency-based system, starting in 1996. This would have eliminated several of the smaller parties and would have reinforced Israelis' tendency to vote for one of the larger parties.

Instead, in order to protect their chances of forming a government in the 1992 election – for which they knew they would still require the support of the small parties in the old system – Labor and Likud passed only direct elections for the prime minister, leaving the Knesset vote in its historic, proportional system.

In last week's election, both large parties paid the price for their short-sightedness of a few years earlier. The split vote decimated Labor and Likud, and transformed the small parties into medium-size parties. The Knesset now offers a representative snapshot of the various solitudes in Israel society.

For Canadians, there was a particular interest in Israel's results.

Labor, Likud lose seats to smaller parties

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The exit polls showed that both Labor and Likud lost considerable strength in the separate race for the Knesset, as small parties, particularly the religious parties and Israel b'Aliyah, a new immigrant party, gained at their expense, thanks to the new direct election of the prime minister.

According to the Channel 1 exit poll, Labor won 35 seats instead of its current 44 (final result was 34), while the Likud-Gesher-Tsomet list got 31 instead of the 40 the Likud and Tsomet won in 1992 (final result was 32). Neither Shimon Peres nor Benjamin Netanyahu was expected to have trouble cobbling together the 61 MKs needed to form a coalition.

The current blocking majority of Labor, Meretz and the Arab parties together won only 53 seats – eight fewer than they had in the outgoing Knesset. The right-wing bloc of the Likud, the National Religious Party, United Torah Judaism and Moledet was also reduced, garnering six fewer seats than last time, for a total of 47. The three parties that did not endorse any candidate for the premiership, Shas, Israel b'Aliyah and The Third Way, won a projected 20 seats.

Among the big winners were the National Religious Party (NRP) and Shas, which both sharply increased their representation. Shas went from six to 10, while the NRP went from six to nine seats. The Israel b'Aliyah party, led by former prisoner of Zion Natan Sharansky, burst its way onto the national political stage by winning a projected seven seats. The Third Way, a new group initiated by hawkish Laborites, also attained three seats (final result was four). Finally, the Arab parties increased their representation from five to eight seats.

Meretz, while falling short of its current 12 seats, reached at least 10, more than than earlier voter surveys had predicted.

Officials said voter turnout was at its traditionally high level. According to Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) officials, 79.7 percent of the 3.9 million eligible voters cast their ballots yesterday. (In 1992, a total of 77.4 percent voted; in 1988, it was 79.7 percent.)

The CBS said 80 percent of the eligible Jewish voters cast their ballots, as did 77.5 percent of the eligible non-Jewish voters.

Labor counted on high Arab turnout

Labor had been counting on a high Arab turnout as integral to a Peres victory. Uzi Baram, No. 2 on Labor's Knesset list after Peres, took the stage at campaign headquarters to thank the Arab voters who backed the party. "We have to coexist. We have to cooperate. We have to have true brotherhood with the Arab citizens," he said to applause.

The 300 Shas supporters gathered at Jerusalem's Panorama Hall erupted in song and prayer as soon as preliminary results were announced showing they had won nine seats.

"Let us say Tehillim [Psalms] and praise God after this great victory," announced party organizer Shimon Maloul over a loudspeaker. "One more and we have a minyan," he joked. Estimates later in the evening in fact pushed the party up to 10 seats.

Supporters of The Third Way opened bottles of Golan Heights champagne and drenched party leader Avigdor Kahalani, as the results of the TV polls were announced.

There was no joy at Agudat Yisrael headquarters in Tel Aviv, neither as a result of the race for prime minister, nor in the vote for the Knesset, in which the party apparently held on to its current four seats.

NRP activists call for united religious bloc

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Accompanied by a clarinetist playing klezmer music, National Religious Party (NRP) MKs broke out into a wedding-style dance about 30 minutes after Channel 1 projected that their party had gone from six to nine seats.

But it seemed a rather half-hearted dance, as the MKs waited – with the rest of the country – for the final results of the Peres-Netanyahu race for prime minister.

"Any way you look at it, this is a victory for the NRP," party head Zevulun Hammer said after the projections were broadcast.

Hammer termed the rise of the religious parties from 16 to a projected 22 seats "excellent." He said that the Meretz anti-religious campaign had boomeranged.

The initial hush that fell over the crowd of some 250 NRP activists at Beit Hahayal in Tel Aviv when a slight advantage for Peres was announced turned into applause when it was announced that the NRP had gained three seats.

Another hush, followed by of cries of "Shas!" ensued, when it was announced that that party had also gained three seats.

MK Shaul Yahalom lost no time in calling for Shas, the NRP and United Torah Judaism to form a united religious bloc. "Only that way will we be able to block Meretz," Yahalom said. He expressed concern that Shas may repeat what it did in 1992 and enter a coalition with Labor and Meretz.

The possibility of the religious parties forming a united bloc dominated the conversations of the party activists.

But MK Yigal Bibi disagreed with Yahalom, saying Shas would not dare enter a coalition alone with Meretz and Labor.

"It would lead to a civil war. After what they did last time, they were unable to walk in the street. They would not repeat it," Bibi said.

Hammer, Yahalom and MK Hanan Porat attributed Shas's surprising rise to the amulets they had distributed, blessed by Rabbi Yitzhak Kaduri.

Satellite links communities exploring election outcome

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In case the coverage in the local media and by international broadcasters like CNN wasn't enough, political junkies with a taste for Israeli politics got a double dose of election analysis thanks to a satellite linkup of Jewish communities around the world.

The Council of Jewish Federations in New York, in conjunction with the National Jewish Community Relations Council and the Israel Democratic Institute, linked Jewish communities in 10 time zones from Tel Aviv to Seattle, to hear the latest results and analyses from Israel.

In Toronto, about 125 people attended the lunchtime event, which was open to the public at no charge.

What they heard was a consensus from Israeli panelists that the new electoral reforms have proven to be a failure and there is a good chance the Knesset will hear proposals to revert back to the old system, with some new modifications.

Meeting in federation offices across North America, members of various Jewish communities were able to get interactive with the Israeli and New York-based panelists, asking them questions about the election.

The panelists fielded queries from federation offices in St. Louis, Seattle, Pittsburgh, Atlanta, Philadelphia and Montreal.

In Toronto, Baruch Gur, a shaliach for the Jewish Agency and the key architect of Operation Exodus, provided election analysis.

Gur noted that Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, though he led Premier Shimon Peres at the time by only .7 percent, had closer to a nine percent lead among Jewish voters.

As premier-elect, Netanyahu is the only one able to form a government and he has two likely choices, Gur suggested. He could either include Labor in a new unity government or he could look to some or all of the religious parties and/or Natan Sharansky's Israel b'Aliyah party.

Religious parties were big winners in the election, getting about 25 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, while Sharansky's expectations were wildly exceeded by his nine-seat showing, Gur said.

Unknown quantity

Gur noted that Peres had never won an election as Labor leader, while for many Israelis, Netanyahu is an unknown quantity. He's perceived as being an American-like candidate: "He doesn't say a lot, he looks good and he talks in slogans."

However Netanyahu, who served in Israeli diplomatic offices in the United States, knows the U.S. scene well and will try to keep U.S.-Israel relations on a positive note, Gur said.

In Israel, Asher Arian of the University of Haifa said the election has led to the "complete disintegration of the Israeli party structure."

Never in the nation's history has the largest party been so small (at the time, Labor led with only 32 seats), while smaller parties gained strength. That reflects a move away from the party system to one of "sectarianism," Arian said.

Yaron Ezrahi of the Hebrew University said Netanyahu must now balance his promise of pursuing peace with the pull from the opposite direction by opponents of the peace process within Likud.

Chaim Ben Shahar of Tel Aviv University said the Israeli economy has benefited from the peace process in the last four years, with a GNP exceeding those of Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon combined.

He said the election news prompted a six percent drop in the Israeli stock market, but it recovered to post a four percent drop. That shows concern among investors and some may re-examine their commitments, he said.

With Likud in government, expect religious groups, settlers and Sharansky's Russian immigrant party to request greater funds, he added.

In New York, journalist J. J. Goldberg suggested that if Likud increases settlements and the peace process slows down, tension may increase between the United States and Israel. Jewish communities will be asked to line up behind Israel.

But with the likelihood that religious parties will press for more influence on issues that concern U.S. Jews, Goldberg suggested U.S. Jews won't be looking to Israel for leadership in reaching out to other Jews and "we will have to fall back on our own resources."

UJA march, festival draws 5,000 for fun, fundraising

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An estimated 5,000 people participated in the recent community march for Israel sponsored by the United Jewish Appeal (UJA).

Sandra Brown, president of the Jewish Federation of the Greater Toronto Area, a participant in the march, told The CJN she was happy to see the number of young people at the march. "It's wonderful to see so many families," she said.

Indeed, there was a large stroller brigade and plenty of kids on roller blades. Children also brought in a significant number of donations.

The most money raised by a child was $790 by Jaime Filer, 8, of Leo Baeck Day School, while Netivot Hatorah students Natanel Philosophe, 9, and his brother Eliezer, 6, raised $500 each. Samuel Hershenhorn raised $1,135, the largest single amount.

The four-kilometre march, which added close to $150,000 to UJA coffers, began at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill and ended at North York Centennial Arena on Finch Avenue, where the Jerusalem 3000 Festival was held, co-sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation and UJA.

"The turn-out was fantastic," said Tillie Margolis, president of the central region of the Canadian Zionist Federation and chair of the Jerusalem 3000 festival, which drew 7,000 people.

The fun-filled festival had something special for every age group, including live music and dance performances, bingo, chess, storytelling, a petting zoo and pony rides. There was also a shuk, with booths selling all kinds of merchandise — Judaica books and ceremonial items, Israeli-made cosmetics and sandals, and munchies like pizza, falafel, snowcones and cotton candy.

Some 300 people attended the bone marrow clinic held at the arena in memory of Adam Kruger.

At the festival's opening ceremonies, it was announced that former Ontario premier Bob Rae and York Centre MP Art Eggleton were this year's recipients of the Jerusalem Award, which was given to them by the World Zionist Organization for their contribution to the Jewish community.

Rae, also on hand to support the bone marrow clinic, told The CJN he was honored to receive the award. Eggleton, who represents one of the largest Jewish ridings in the country, said he was happy to be a part of the birthday celebration for Jerusalem.

Other dignitaries included Jim Peterson, MP, Willowdale; Joe Volpe, MP, Eglinton-Lawrence; Jehudi Kinar, Israeli consul general; Annamarie Castrilli, MPP Downsview; Metro councillors Howard Moscoe and Norm Gardner; Moishe Ronen, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Kurt Rothschild, national president of the Canadian Zionist Federation and Cantor Louis Danto.

The festival's opening ceremonies on the main stage were sandwiched between live concerts by local bands Tree Top Kids, The Simpletones and Original Stars Band with Liberty Silver, and a program of Israeli song and dance. The Hebrew choirs were directed by Ophir Doron with choreography coordinated by Rivka Atzmoni.

Choirs from Bialik Hebrew Day School and Leo Baeck Day School and the Hava Nagila Singers sang, followed by Israeli folkdance performances by Bialik Jr. dance group, Chai Dancers and Born to Freedom Dance.

Former comrade-in-arms identifies Kalejs

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former senior officer in the Arajs Kommando identifed accused Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs as a lieutenant in the notorious Latvian police unit that murdered tens of thousands of Jews.

In videotaped testimony played before Immigration adjudicator Anthony Iozzo, Harijs (Harry) Svikeris said he met Kalejs when he joined the Arajs Kommando in the summer of 1941. He recognized Kalejs because "he was my schoolmate" at a pre-war Latvian military college.

Also tendered into evidence by Immigration lawyer Bonnie Boucher was a document published by the presidium of the Latvian Military College that featured the photos of the 11th graduating class. Both Svikeris and Kalejs appeared.

The evidence confirms other documents and now, oral testimony, that placed Kalejs in the Arajs Kommando, a volunteer unit that, together with German forces, murdered more than 30,000 Latvian Jews.

Kalejs, a citizen of Australia, is facing deportation because of his alleged involvement in the Latvian killing squad. The United States deported Kalejs in 1993 for that involvement.

Following his removal from the United States, Kalejs moved to Toronto and he now resides in an upscale North York condominium building that also has many Jewish residents, including Holocaust survivors.

The videotape evidence was recorded between June and October 1993 by New Scotland Yard as part of its war crimes investigation of Svikeris, who was Kalejs' superior officer in the unit. Svikeris died before he could be brought to trial.

During his interrogation by British police, Svikeris said that after a battle in the village of Nasswa, he left Kalejs in charge while he returned to Riga. Svikeris offered Kalejs' name without any prompting.

In testimony that was replete with contradictions, Svikeris claimed he joined the unit to fight communists and instil military discipline among the recruits and that he never participated in any shootings of Jews.

He denied a statement by the police interrogator that none of the 33 former Arajs Kommando members identified him as a training officer.

At one point in his testimony, he claimed only Germans carried out the shootings and that the Arajs Kommando was involved only in arrests. He later admitted he heard "rumors" that "they were going out somewhere, cleaning and shooting, whatever they do."

When confronted by Scotland Yard interrogators about testimony from other, junior members of the Arajs Kommando who claimed Svikeris participated in the round-up and killing of civilians, he protested, calling them liars and saying he never witnessed any killings.

"They were simply making themselves as angels by telling lies," Svikeris said.

After claiming that the Arajs Kommando was not "officially" involved in any killings, he did acknowledge that members of the unit might have been "unofficially" involved.

Asked about the Nov. 30, 1941 mass killing of Riga Jews, Svikeris said the Arajs Kommando did not participate, but when told Arajs members acknowledged their involvement, Svikeris said "Oh my God, that must be the biggest lie of the century ... How could they [participate] if I didn't know?"

"They identified you" as the senior commander there, the detective inspector told Svikeris, adding that practically the entire unit participated in the killings.

Svikeris stated he did not participate in any killings and that he only heard "rumors" and "hearsay" of shootings.

Following further questioning, Svikeris admitted he accompanied the Kommando on one occasion to forests outside Riga where 12 to 50 civilians were taken to an open pit and shot. He said he did not participate but watched from a distance of 150 to 200 metres.

Despite that distance, Svikeris said he saw the faces of the victims and it seemed "they were more or less accepting of their fate."

A document then presented to Svikeris, signed by him on Jan. 13, 1942 as "acting head of the security command," contradicted his testimony that he was only a training officer and was serving in Russia at the time. "That's a dumb thing what I don't like," Svikeris said.

Government cuts hurting JF&CS programs

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The full impact of the Ontario government's cutbacks to social service agencies won't be felt until later this year, but they will hurt, the annual meeting of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) heard last week.

Only weeks after they were elected a year ago, the Tories announced a five percent cut to spending on social services and a 21 percent reduction in social assistance, said JF&CS president Michael Bowman.

The full effect of those cuts will be felt in the coming months, but one early casualty was the closing late last year of the Jerome D. Diamond Centre residence for troubled Jewish teens, Bowman said.

He called the decision to shut the residence "gut-wrenching," but said all its clients were relocated to another Metro-area residence.

Bowman, who was re-elected to a second one-year term as president, said the mission before JF&CS will be to "struggle just to maintain services."

At the least, the agency avoided employee layoffs over the past year, he noted, and ended its fiscal year with just a $59 deficit.

The Conservative government's belief that social assistance discourages people from taking responsibility for themselves "undermines" Jewish values, stated JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe.

Judaism teaches we are all responsible for the other, he said.

Wolfe paid tribute to two employees, Teri Kay and Sheila Walker, for their 25 years of service.

The annual meeting provided a special salute to Jewish foster families, notably to Raymond and Victoria Williams, who have fostered nine children and teens over the past 13 years.

The Williams gave a humorous but heartfelt look at the ups and downs of fostering.

More heartfelt were the personal testimonies of two Crown wards currently in foster care. There were few dry eyes in the house as the teens, a boy and a girl, recounted how foster care likely saved their lives.

Over the past year, the meeting heard, JF&CS carried over 2,800 cases, distributed $1.2 million to the Jewish poor, cared directly for 82 children, investigated 270 allegations of abuse, counselled 300 abused women and served 37 children in foster care.

Completing their terms on the JF&CS board of directors were Cindy Chisvin, Paul Forman, Bob Kanee, Howard Sandys and Jeff Shumacher.

Welcomed as new board members were Marlene Axmith, David Barkin, Paul Braun, Al Dickstein, Robert Furman, Connie Gold, Tova Greenberg and Jack Martell.

Polish newspaper under review

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Polish-language newspaper that consistently devotes numerous articles to attacks on Jews will be studied to determine whether a complaint to law enforcement authorities on hate-related charges is warranted, the Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC) said last week.

Sol Littman said the SWC's legal committee will examine the Glos Polski (Polish Voice) newspaper to see if it has violated Canada's anti-hate laws.

The SWC is also planning to ask federal and provincial ministries to refrain from advertising in or providing any grants to Glos Polski, Littman said.

The weekly newspaper is published by the Polish National Union of Canada (PNUC).

In a recent letter to the editor of the paper, Littman states that "week after week, Glos Polski obsessively carries lengthy articles describing Jews in the vilest of terms ... The hatred you express in every edition dishonors the thousands of Poles who risked their lives to rescue Jews during the Nazi period."

One example of anti-Semitic material cited by Littman is the Sept. 2, 1995 edition of the paper. It features an article headlined: Do the Jews Rule the World and Poland?

Beneath it is a cartoon of two hook-nosed individuals wearing pointed hats decorated with Stars of David, throwing people into a boiling cauldron. The pot is emblazoned with a devil's face set in the middle of a large Star of David.

The two caricatured figures are wearing robes, one decorated with dollar signs the other with Soviet hammers and sickles.

A translation of the article, provided by the SWC, states that "the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. were part and parcel of the same world-dominating system, sharing common goals and ideology — the system operated by Jewish chauvinists."

Elsewhere, the article claims that "the conditions created for the Slavic nations under Soviet domination were aimed at the extinction of those nations. In the midst of exterminating the Slavic nations, it dawned on the Jews that they no longer needed communism, which was inefficient, underdeveloped and repulsive."

Calls to the paper's editor were not returned, but PNUC president Robert Varin questioned whether the newspaper published any anti-Semitic material.

"The problem is of bigger size," he said. "The problem is that we have a lot of evidence that shows a certain segment of the Jewish people have a lot of prejudice against Poles."

He suggested that some Jews accuse Poles of having built concentration camps and of having collaborated with the Nazis. The movie Shtetl, he continued, is an example of "how the Jews talk about the Poles, who are represented in a bad, bad light."

Varin, a professor of engineering at the University of Waterloo, said the article on the Jews ruling Poland and the world was reprinted from another publication and he acknowledged it might not have been in "good taste."

Bernard Wisniewski, secretary-general of the Canadian Polish Congress (CPC) said the PNUC comes under the CPC umbrella but "we don't tell anyone what to write...If they do something extremely wrong or [illegal] then we'd ask them to get out." He said the paper represents an "extreme right" viewpoint.

We have talked with Mr. Shelley Prasad, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair.

He also discovered the use of [illegible] Acid products. The P.H. level [illegible]

Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5; regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. There's true revolution.

Social issues seen as Israel's next challenge

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Israel finally does achieve peace with its neighbors, it will have to concentrate on its own social agenda, says a representative of Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

"It will be wonderful to have peace, but it will also be wonderful for it to have the freedom to deal with its own domestic needs," said Simon Rosenblum.

Rosenblum, along with Meyer Amor, an Israeli studying in Canada, was speaking at a workshop that formed part of the recent Congress of Secular Jewish Organizations' 1996 conference.

"The peace agreement has to include a social peace process that involves the people, and one of the fundamental elements should be reciprocal responsibility and mutual recognition. The well-being of one side must be perceived as being the well-being of the other side. For a long time neither the Israelis nor the Palestinians recognized each other's right to exist," Amor said.

Cultural integration is another obstacle to a social peace process, Amor said. "Currently, Israel is too Ashkenazi in its structure and outlook. For the last 50 years, the people who have basically made major decisions have been the Jews from Eastern European countries or their descendants. Sephardis are not represented at the decision making level. A social change should take place that will see some attention paid to the Sephardi Jews."

As well, he added, Israel is too religious in its purpose. "Women, for example, are subjected to religious laws that were formulated 2,000 years ago and they are not equal citizens. Most of these issues can be resolved, however, through discussions that can turn Israel into a state for its citizens."

An important issue that has to be resolved, Rosenblum said, is that of final borders. "We will still have the major problem of settlements — some will have to wind down and some will have to stay under the jurisdiction of the Palestinian state. Israel knows full well that that is an inevitable outcome of the peace process."

On a positive note, Rosenblum said that Israel is undergoing enormous economic growth and some of this has to do with the peace process. "Class and ethnicity, however, are an issue. As Israel enters a knowledge-based economy, it is seeing an unusual distribution of income, and that problem must be addressed.

"The Palestinian economic future is a little more difficult . Any emerging state has its problems, but some of these are intensified by the singular leadership of Yasser Arafat," he said.

Other workshops in the three-day conference included talks on Israel and a Secular Humanistic Jewish Identity, Confronting and Changing Racism and Intolerance Inside the Jewish Community, What and How Should We Teach our Children About Israel and teaching the Secular Humanistic Jewish Way.

Citron launches new suit

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After failing to convince Crown lawyers to proceed on criminal charges, Sabina Citron has launched a libel suit against neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel.

The civil suit cites 10 articles posted by Zundel on his Internet computer home page that he calls Zundelsite. Her libel notice alleges the articles "are defamatory of her ... contain false and defamatory statements about her and that the articles were published maliciously."

One article suggests she engages in extortion and that she is "implicated in crimes, rackets, shady deals, extortion or war crimes against Germans," Citron's Libel Notice claims.

Zundel posted Citron's Libel Notice on his Website last week, shortly after it was filed in court.

Citron has attempted to silence Zundel's anti-Semitic propaganda on numerous occasions. She laid charges of publishing "false news" that led to a nine-year legal battle during which Zundel was twice convicted of publishing lies denying the Holocaust. In the end, the Supreme Court of Canada threw out his conviction when it ruled the "false news" law was unconstitutional.

More recently, Citron laid conspiracy to promote hatred and criminal defamation charges against Zundel. Though a Justice of the Peace allowed the charges, they were dropped by Crown lawyers who cited lack of evidence.

The civil suit differs from the previous legal measures employed by Citron. She is not alleging that Zundel committed a crime but that he damaged her reputation by publishing falsehoods about her. If the suit is successful, a court could order Zundel to pay Citron damages and to refrain from publishing such material about her in the future.

Citron was unavailable for comment.

The seamless change

In democracies, governments change seamlessly. Election campaigns generally become heated, often angry and occasionally even ugly contests. Inflamed partisan passions spawn rhetoric aimed at individuals rather than arguments aimed at ideas. In their aggressive competition for voter loyalties, rival ideologies indignantly push and pull at each other. The social fabric sometimes stretches. But it does not tear.

The just-concluded elections in Israel are eloquent proof of this. As soon as the election results were officially announced, the transition from one government to another began. Having defeated Shimon Peres in the contest for prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu is now assembling his cabinet and is trying to cobble together a coalition from which to govern in the Knesset.

As we wrote in this space before the election, and as subsequent events have confirmed, the country is essentially divided down the middle into two large blocs. This makes coalition-building more important than ever, yet all the more delicate.

The elections were the first ever in which Israelis voted separately for the prime minister and for their preferred political party. Analysts and commentators continue to pour over the outcome to assess its every possible meaning. For example, experts, including some whose opinions appear in this issue of The CJN, are presently asking questions such as: What voting patterns emerged? What conclusions do they yield about social and religious matters in Israel? What will be their impact, if any, on Israel's bilateral and multilateral relations with nations in the region? What are the ramifications, if any, for relations with the Diaspora?

All of the answers to all of the possible questions will become apparent in the fullness of time. For this reason we will leave such speculation to others. But because we hold the fact of an election to be as vital as its result, it is important to reflect and comment upon the contributions made by the individuals who are the leaders, political opponents, not political foes. As appropriate as it is to convey our good wishes to the prime minister-elect, it is also important to convey our gratitude to outgoing prime minister Shimon Peres.

Even his detractors will admit that Peres' career has been remarkable, a life lived in dedicated and exhausting service to country.

He was only 24 years old when David Ben-Gurion appointed him in 1947 to be the chief of manpower for the Haganah. Six years later, he became Director General of the Defence Ministry. As the director general, he was widely credited for establishing the military's electronics and aircraft industries and Israel's nuclear capability.

His Knesset career began in 1959 at the age of 36. He has been in the Knesset ever since in various senior portfolios including, of course, the most senior, that of prime minister. In last Sunday's New York Times, Thomas Friedman wrote about Peres in conjunction with Yitzhak Rabin: "These two old war horses came together at the end of their long politcial careers to form one of the most unique and creative leadership teams in Jewish history."

To the prime minister-elect, Benjamin Netanyahu, we express our profound wishes of congratulations. There is probably no prime ministership on earth whose responsibilities bear such immediate and far-reaching consequences. Leaders in opposition have always discovered, given the opportunity to govern, that responsibility is both enobling and restraining. Criticism gives way to reasoned and reasonable policies. Rhetoric by the opposition can be dismissed as parliamentary posturing. Statements by a prime minister are a nation's policy. They cannot be dismissed at all.

May God grant the new prime minister of Israel wisdom, courage, insight and strength. And may we all live to see under his guidance, unity among the Jewish people, and peace for Israel and for all.

Corrects the record on astronaut Resnik

Re: "Judith Resnik: Astronaut with a dream," by Linda Ander in Kids News (CJN May 2).

Judith Resnik died when the Challenger exploded, at 11:39 a.m. on Tuesday, Jan. 28, 1986, not Jan. 29, 1986 at 11:38 a.m. as stated.

In addition, according to NASA summaries, Resnik was born in Akron, Ohio, not Cleveland, Ohio.

Denies charge of anti-Semitism

Rabbi Bernard Baskin's May 23 column, "Religionist's stand proves Puzzling," was unworthy. Associating my name in any way with anti-Semitism is nonsense, as any responsible examination of my life's work in the media and in my books makes clear.

I am greatly astonished to discover that just by quoting Dr. Israel Shahak, a writer, scholar, human rights activist — a Holocaust survivor and an Israeli citizen for 40 years — one can elicit such gross misunderstanding.

A different view of the Book of Ruth

In CJN May 16, Rachael Turkienicz has offered an interpretation of the Book of Ruth. An analogy is made with Job and a distinction drawn between a male and female response to adversity. While Job maintains his integrity Naomi is said to assume the blame. The article closes with the egregious suggestion that this is the result of leaving one's home and taking foreign brides.

It pains me to read such a dreary and convoluted assessment of a wonderful story, a model of literary style with great contemporary social significance.

It is an exaltation of women who, through mutual love and support, are able to turn adverse circumstances to good account. It is also a constructive lesson of tolerance and acceptance.

Welcomes action to speed up war crimes trials

It is reassuring that Chief Justice Julius Isaac of the Federal Court of Canada has responded to complaints by government lawyers that Associate Chief Justice James Jerome was unable or unwilling to deal with three Nazi war criminal cases quickly.

The request by Ottawa lawyer, Don Bayne, who represents the accused Johanne Dueck, for a stay of all proceedings because of what he calls an improper, private, behind-the-scenes attempt to influence, pressure and interfere with course of the proceeding is entirely without foundation. He is perhaps frustrated that after all these years, his client will finally be brought to justice and he finds it uncomfortable that at last the government is listening to those who have deplored the slow pace of prosecution to date.

One would think, if the alleged Nazis are as innocent as their lawyers protest, that they would want an early resolution of the charges against them.

Guelph's own 'Man of Iron'

I would like to add a comment to the editor's column, "A Man of Iron" (CJN, April 18).

For many years, Beth Isaiah Synagogue in Guelph has been honored to have Irving Eisner lead High Holy Day services. His sermons, sprinkled liberally with references taken from the depths of his learning, enrich the sanctity of these days. A walk to the river for Tashlich serves as an occasion to hear Eisner's stories of life before the war. Many tears of sadness have been shed as we approach the river, yet we always leave inspired by his sense of optimism for the future.

While Eisner may have formally retired as an educator, we in Guelph know that this gentle and respected person will continue to teach words of Torah to all whom he meets.

Perspectives

The election is over – let the healing begin

By GERALD M. STEINBERG

The election campaign and its outcome have demonstrated that the Israeli public is more divided than ever before. The television and radio advertisements of both major parties ignored the problem, and neither Benjamin Netanyahu nor Shimon Peres mentioned the internal threat to national survival in their key debate.

The emotional words heard after the tragedy of the Yitzhak Rabin assassination on tolerance and the need to develop bridges between left and right and between the religious and secular segments of Jewish society were all forgotten.

With such bitter divisions over critical issues, it will be difficult for either leader to govern effectively with a narrow coalition.

The first priority of the new prime minister should not be directed externally, toward the Palestinians or Syria, but rather inwardly, toward restoring a sense of national unity and overcoming the deep bitterness and distrust.

One possibility that should be considered is the creation of a broad coalition of national unity, for a period of one year.

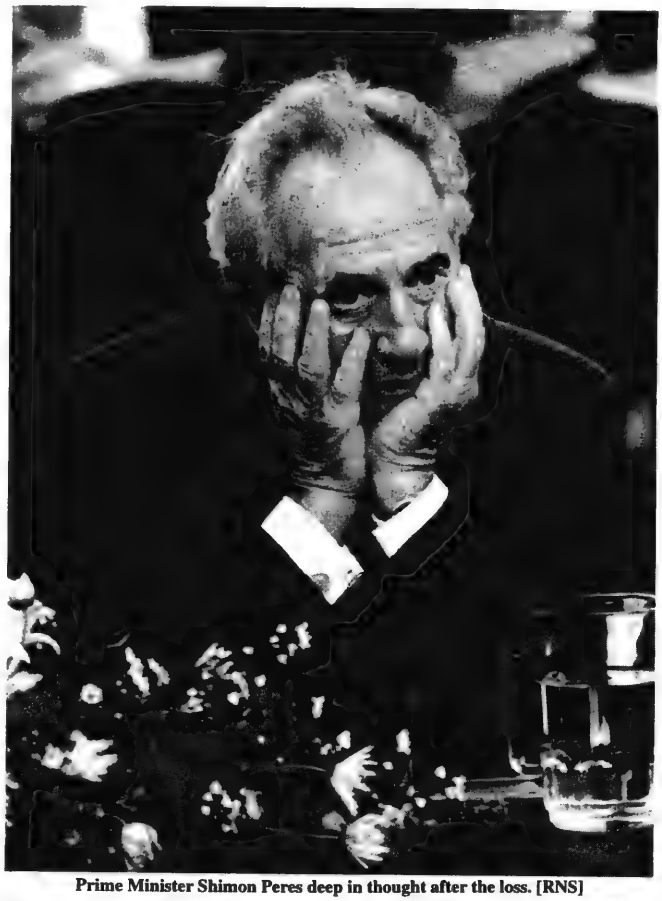
In 1984 and 1988, similarly close election results led to the formation of national unity governments consisting of both major parties and rotation in the position of prime minister. Although they ended in conflict, in many ways these governments accomplished several important objectives.

Difficult decisions regarding the economy were taken and implemented with wide support (in retrospect, more could and should have been done at the time). The government also withdrew the IDF from most of Lebanon, (except for the security zone).

While the splits in society were not healed, further division was avoided. Perhaps the conditions are ripe for another broad coalition.

The political divisions between left and right, and the social and cultural splits between secular and religious pose the greatest threat to national security and survival. The support for the anti-religious Meretz party, on the one hand, and the religious parties, on the other, are manifestations of the growing conflict among Israelis.

A narrow government based on a minimum coalition would leave a very sizable minority bitter and alienated. A government supported by 51 percent of the population cannot be said to have received a mandate for sweeping changes and policies, whether in the political, economic, or social spheres. The problems of a unity government or broad coalition are significant ones.



Prime Minister Shimon Peres deep in thought after the loss. [RNS]

The bitterness of the campaign will make it difficult for the two major parties and leaders to work together.

However, the 1985 and 1988 elections were no less bitter and personal, and yet it did not prevent the party heads from cooperating and, to some degree, working together in areas of agreement.

More significant, such coalitions tend to be frozen by internal division.

In 1990, the crisis that led to the breakup of the unity government followed disagreements over negotiations with the Arab states and the proposal for an international peace conference on the Middle East. (Ironically, while the Likud and prime minister Yitzhak Shamir rejected the proposal, backed by Peres and the Labor party, in October 1991 Shamir led the Israeli delegation at the Madrid conference.)

It is true that a government with both Netanyahu and Peres (or, if Peres retires, perhaps Ehud Barak and Efraim Sneh) would have great difficulty in agreeing on policy with respect to critical issues such as withdrawal from Hebron, the future of settlements, permanent-status agreements with the Palestinians and negotiations over the Golan Heights.

But these difficulties are an accurate reflection of the intense conflicts that divide Israeli society.

Four years after voting to takes risks in the peace process, over half of the Israeli public has found the inaction of the Palestinians to end terrorism to be grossly inadequate.

Under such conditions, any decisions taken by a narrow government with a minimal majority will be fiercely contested by the opposition, and only cause further division. In his election campaign, Peres understood that even with a majority he would need the wider legitimacy provided by a referendum to complete agreement on final status with the Palestinians and over the issue of withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

The same policy should be adopted with respect to the radical policies associated with the Likud, such as the expansion of settlements or the construction of new ones.

A broad coalition, including religious and anti- religious, Labor and the Likud, the immigrants under the leadership of Natan Sharansky and the Third Way, would be able to begin tackling the economic and social difficulties over one year. During that year, the primary emphasis would be on reforging the common denominators of Zionism and Israeli national identity.

Then, after some unity has been restored, the external issues of security and borders could be tackled with greater confidence and strength.

Bibi should learn from Begin and Shamir

By YOSEF GOELL

The most urgent task facing Netanyahu will be that of forming his government coalition. The main problems in this regard are the previous commitments Netanyahu made to ensure his election, and the sheer size and composition of his potential coalition. In order to clear the decks of third and fourth candidates for the premiership to ensure his win over Peres in the first round of voting, Netanyahu agreed to allocate seven seats each on the Likud Knesset list to David Levy's Gesher party and Rafael Eitan's Tsomet, and to ensure those two groups commensurate representation in the cabinet.

Any Netanyahu government will have to include all three religious parties and most likely Rehavam Ze'evi's Moledet. Even if these parties provide a Netanyahu government with a 61-seat majority, it would be desirable to expand the government further by the inclusion of Sharansky's Israel b'Aliyah and the Third Way to ensure a coalition of a minimum of 67 to 68 seats.

Netanyahu would do well to learn from the experience and failures of the Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir governments. They were marked by the abysmal quality of most of the Likud ministers, and especially by the succession of finance ministers who caused, presided over and proved pathetically helpless in the face of over five years of three-digit hyperinflation and the near collapse of the banking system in 1983. If Netanyahu hopes to be re-elected and to establish the Likud as Israel's natural ruling party for the long-term, it is essential that he pay much more attention to the quality of the Likud ministers he plans to appoint to the top posts in his government.

Perhaps the most crucial decision in this regard will be that of naming a deputy prime minister for domestic affairs. One of the lessons of recent Likud and Labor governments is that prime ministers who are deeply involved in crucial security and foreign policy issues and in ensuring the political viability of their governments do themselves and the country a disservice in insisting on being the final arbiters on domestic and economic issues too.

David Ben-Gurion was fortunate in having Levi Eshkol as his domestic-policies czar, and Eshkol in turn was fortunate in having Pinhas Sapir serve in a similar role. Any such appointment admittedly runs the risk of grooming a possible competitor for the premiership, but the advantages for the proper functioning of the government, and the long-term impact of such success on the electorate, far outweigh that risk.

As prime minister, Netanyahu would do well to emulate Begin in his inspired appointment of disaffected Laborite Moshe Dayan as his foreign minister. Netanyahu should look for a disaffected Labor hawk to appoint to his cabinet, both to give substance to his claim to be striving for national unity as opposed to Labor's insistence on further dividing the country and to add internal dissension to an already dispirited Labor which has been defeated at the polls.

Opinions

For the sake of Heaven

Let me say a few words on behalf of the Jewish civil servant.

I've been both — a volunteer and a Jewish civil servant. In both roles there have been rewards and disappointments. I have known the joy of seeing a community organization become stronger, change and grow. I have also seen the bitterness of spirit that comes over the Jewish civil servant when he or she encounters the attitude that treats him, or her, as the servant, forgetting the civil part.

By Jean M. Gerber

Many nights, weekends, early mornings have been spent away from family because, like volunteers, paid staff has a commitment to the community. Why then is it so difficult for people to accept the need for professionals to assure quality of service?

Consider these experiences: canvassing for the Combined Jewish Appeal and being told, "Why should I give money to pay your salary? I want the money to go where it will really help someone." Or, while enjoying what was to be a pleasant summer picnic, being berated by a friend for spending the community's money on a junket (professional convention) that would bring no benefit to the community. Or consider being told by a rabbi (a fellow communal professional) that my position was a waste of community money.

Vayikra (Leviticus), as well as other segments of the Torah, deals with duties of the priests. Priests were the first civil servants of the Israelite community. Judges and prophets were the lay leadership of that same Israelite community. While the priests enabled Israel to observe the ritual necessities, judges and prophets were leaders that prodded the king and his advisors, making sure that the community acted in an ethical way. When neither priest nor prophet nor king led, the rabbis took over the position as the civil servants of the Jewish community.

Today, the Jewish community still has its civil servants. A combination of paid staff and volunteer leadership now governs our communities, from pre-teen groups to seniors councils, from preschool to study groups of chavurot, from the president and owners of Lender's Bagels (who by collecting $35 million assured the release of Ethiopian Jewry) to Hebrew Assistance Societies, from haredi to the Society for Humanistic Judaism.

Is the Jewish communal worker worth the respect as well as the money? I think so. My mentor, the late Morris Saltzman taught me that being a Jewish civil servant was a position of honor and dignity and that if I aspired to be one, I would have to accept the long hours and short pay cheques that went with the territory. At no time did I feel the community's money was wasted, either on me or on the dozens of teachers, directors, social workers, rabbis, cantors, geriatric nurses, day-care workers and others who make up the thousands who work for our community.

In fact, the book of Pirke Avot has much to say about the work of the community. For instance, Rabban Gamliel said, "Let all those who occupy themselves with the work of the community do so for the sake of heaven, for the merit of their ancestors will sustain them and their devotion to duty, too, will endure forever."

I'll give two important reasons why communities should value their professionals and assure that future communal workers are recruited and trained. First, like the practitioners of any craft or art, Jewish communal servants bring insights, information and expertise on a wide range of topics to any communal task.

Few of us would like to build our own houses, write our own wills, heal ourselves or even do our own tax planning. We hire someone whose training, knowledge of the entire field and coordinating skills help us to get our job done. So too, with our teachers, social workers, federation professionals, Congress directors, rabbis and cantors. We should value the expertise they bring to the job.

Second, volunteers have made our communities the best organized in the world, but volunteers have limited time to devote to a task. Professional staff gives back-up, coordination, and again insight to the task at hand, and is usually at the end of a phone-call day or night, giving the volunteer the scope to do his or her job and maintain a life as well. Professional staff knows the territory across North America, the trends, the places where information can be gleaned and often the pit-falls others have fallen into in similar situations.

In short, volunteers and staff alike both have a share and a duty to perform. Respect for each other's strengths can only make our communities better.

Jewish spirit survived in Soviet Union

In 1948, the Soviet Union was experiencing one of its periodic Stalinist descents into anti-Semitism. This despite the fact that at the United Nations in the previous year, the Soviet delegate Andrei Gromyko had delivered a stirring speech on behalf of the Palestine partition resolution and the creation of the State of Israel.

By Arnold Ages

One theory has it that the visit of Israel's foreign minister, Golda Meir, triggered an avalanche of hostility towards Soviet Jews because of the huge turnout of Moscow Jews to welcome her. The Kremlin used its well-known Jewish mascot Ilya Ehrenburg to write a strong piece in Pravda, the official organ of the Soviet Communist party, condemning the display of support and affection for Meir and warning Jews that they had only one loyalty — to the Soviet Union.

From 1948 until 1953 and the death of the Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin, the condition of Jews in the Soviet Union was a perilous one. Yiddish writers, Jewish doctors, scientists and professors, Jewish students and workers were arrested, imprisoned and in certain instances put to death after hasty show trials. There are reports that just before his death, Stalin was preparing mass transport of Soviet Jews to Siberia.

I have always asked myself the following question. During this terrible period, was there no one in the Soviet Union who actually defended Jews or spoke out against the Stalinist terror? The second part of this question is perhaps a naive one. Speaking out during that period would have been an act of suicide. However, I recently learned that defending Jews can take many forms.

I was at a concert of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at Lincoln Centre in New York City listening to some music by the well-known Russian composer Dmitri Shostakovich. The New York Philharmonic had brought in Valery Gergiev, the director of the Kirov Opera in St. Petersburg, to direct, among other selections, a 25-minute work — Shostakovich's From Jewish Folk Poetry.

Musicologist James Keller points out that Shostakovich was 42 years old in 1948 when he composed his extraordinary musical rendering of 11 folksongs drawn from the Jewish experience. In the Gergiev presentation, three world-class singers, a soprano, a mezzo-soprano and a tenor sang glorious Russian-language versions of Hebrew and Yiddish folk melodies.

The songs in question, dealing with a lament for a dead child, a thoughtful mother, a lullaby, a parting, a warning and an abandoned father, truly captured the warmth, family solidarity and loving atmosphere of Jewish folk melodies. The Russian singers from the Kirov did justice to the musical airs of Russian-Jewish life.

However, the extraordinary thing is not that Shostakovich composed brilliantly, but that he composed at all. In 1948 when he wrote From Jewish Folk Poetry, the Soviet Union was undergoing a Stalinist-inspired paroxysm of anti-Semitism. This campaign did not intimidate the great composer, who had shown in the past (as he was to show in the future) that art could not be tailored to suit political agendas. Shostakovich was, however, no fool and chose to perform his tribute to Jewish folk poetry in private. Apparently his composition was widely known among music lovers in the Soviet Union, but it had no official existence. It was not until 1955, after Stalin's death, that it was performed publicly for the first time at the Glinka Hall in Leningrad.

This was not the first time, Keller reminds us, that Shostakovich had used Jewish musical motifs. "By 1948, he had already put overtly Jewish themes to use in several compositions, including his Violin Concerto No. 1 and his profoundly moving Piano Trio No. 2. In 1946, he had served as an examiner for a doctoral thesis on Yiddish folk songs presented at the Moscow Conservatory."

Forty years later, the living musical voice of Dmitri Shostakovich was heard again at the New York City Philharmonic and it showed that even in the dark days of 1948 in Stalinist Russia, one man used his talent to pierce the darkness and celebrate the creativity of the Jewish spirit.

The more things change...

Contrary to your first impression, this column does not deal with the outcome of the recent Israeli elections — especially since it was written a week before. What I will try to show, by illuminating a small corner of Israeli life, is that regardless of how the electorate cast their ballots, good things in Israel will remain good and get even better. As an example, I will choose a subject on which Messrs. Peres and Netanyahu agree. The subject is — children and tennis.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

In most countries, including Canada, tennis represents just another sport. Not so in Israel. There, in 11 centres spread around the country from north to south, it has become an important institution for social and character education. For the game, unlike so much in daily life, requires self-control, etiquette and honesty. It is always — at least in amateur circle — played for the joy of it and not for any personal benefit. Its spectators too are accustomed to the kind of fair play which exists in so few areas of our existence, and certainly in but few sports enterprises. People in the stands may have preferences in favor of one or the other player, but they will heartily applaud the other side for the excellence of a shot. (Golf is similar in this respect, but tennis has always come first for me.)

So what does this have to do with Israel? Tennis has become an opportunity for children of all classes and backgrounds, national origins or political convictions, rich and poor, to come together and learn respect for each other in an atmosphere of total equity and fairness. Those who support the Israel tennis centres have for years not only built facilities, they have often constructed them in poorer sections of town and have thereby attracted the entire cross-section of the juvenile population. Once a year, a talented group of these children, led by their coaches, make tours abroad. Canada is fortunate to be among those chosen to receive, admire and support them.

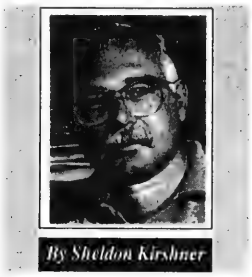
For support is needed again in a very special way. During the recent Operation Grapes of Wrath that Israel launched in order to end the Katyusha rocket attacks in upper and western Galilee, the Kiryat Shmona Tennis Centre was severely hit by the rockets. One of the coaches, Shimon Cohen, was at home with his two children when a missile came crashing through the roof into the family's living room. Fortunately no one was injured and Cohen is now back at work teaching children who lost their homes.

The 11 centres involve some 50,000 children during the year, teaching more than a sport. They are one area in Israeli life where people from the most diverse backgrounds gather together and, in the process, produce young people who are among the best in the world.

If you live in or near Toronto, treat yourself to that special opportunity of seeing some of these youngsters in action. It will provide an hour of wonderful pleasure and instil in you the kind of pride that comes from identifying with the very best that is Israel. The date is June 9, and if you want to come, call 905-660-1999. See you there!

The Kirshner File

Russian Jews fear Communist election victory



On April 21, shortly after his meeting with 12 Russian political figures in Moscow, Bill Clinton, the American president, conferred with a number of Jewish leaders.

One of them, Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt, the chief rabbi of Moscow, asked Clinton whether the rights of Russian Jews would be preserved in the event of a Communist party victory in the June 16 presidential election.

"I don't know, I don't know," Clinton replied. "They say one thing and do another."

Less than two weeks before Russians cast their ballots, Jews in Russia are surely wondering what lies in store for them should the Communists, led by Gennadi Zyuganov, topple the incumbent, Boris Yeltsin.

Having finished in first place in last December's parliamentary election, and having taken the lead in the polls, the Communists seem poised to return to office, a prospect the vast majority of Russian Jews dreads.

A minor functionary during the Soviet period, which ended in December 1991, Zyuganov has promoted himself as an innocuous Social Democrat who merely wishes to restore Russia as a great power and to curb the excesses of capitalism.

But to his adversaries, Zyuganov is a dictator in the making, an unabashed admirer of Josef Stalin and an anti-Western nationalist who has linked up with reactionaries in a "red-brown" alliance.

Jews are particularly wary of Zyuganov. They fear that he will dismantle the reforms which are gradually creating a free market economy. And they suspect that he is an anti-Semite who may well resurrect state anti-Semitism, a blemish on Soviet society from the late 1940s onward.

Since the collapse of the Communist system, Jews have played a prominent role in the development of a capitalist economy. The process, however, has had a devastating effect on many Russians, especially pensioners and government employees, who generally support the Communists. The new business class, of which Jews are a major component, abhors communism.

In his travels through the country, Zyuganov has been careful not to spout anti-Semitism. But his books, I Believe in Russia, and Beyond the Horizon, brim with anti-Jewish innuendos.

For example: writing menacingly of the "perceptible influence of Judaic dispersal," he claims that "the Jewish Diaspora traditionally controlled the financial life of (Europe) and became more and more the owner of the controlling interest in all the stocks of Western civilization ..."

And in an allusion to Stalin, Zyuganov observes that if he had only lived "a few years more," he would have "restored Russia and saved it from the cosmopolitans," a buzzword for Jews.

By all appearances, Zyuganov has fallen under the baneful spell of his ideological mentor and political advisor, Aleksandr Prokhanov, the editor of Zavtra (Tomorrow), which advocates Yeltsin's violent removal.

Prokhanov, whose previous newspaper, Dyen (The Day), was banned by the authorities in 1993, is an outspoken anti-Semite who laments the "power" of Jews. But Prokhanov is more than just a common rabble-rouser. He is credited with having helped Zyuganov forge an entente with far-right nationalist forces.

By all accounts, most Jews will vote for either Yeltsin or Grigory Yavlinsky (who is half-Jewish), rejecting the likes of Mikhail Gorbachev, the last Soviet president; Aleksandr Lebed, a retired general; and Vladimir Zhirinovsky (Edelsthein), the self-hating Jew who came in second in last year's election.

Yeltsin, however, is a flawed candidate, unpresidential in bearing and prone to pandering to right-wing opinion.

In addition, the loss of the Jewish Agency's accreditation in Russia, which took place recently, could not have happened without Yeltsin's knowledge and approval.

Community surveyed

Much has been written about the Jews of the former Soviet Union. But until quite recently, astonishingly enough, a scientific survey of the community had never been attempted.

To a degree, this gap now has been filled by Robert Brym and Rozalina Ryvkina in their informative book, The Jews of Moscow, Kiev and Minsk: Identity, Anti-Semitism, Emigration (McClelland & Stewart). Brym is a professor of sociology at the University of Toronto and his colleague is a department head at the All-Russian Centre for Public Opinion Research in Moscow.

Due to financial considerations, the authors were unable to range too far and wide, forced to confine themselves to Russia, Ukraine and Belarus.

Fewer than a fifth of the Jews who responded to their survey had a working knowledge of Hebrew or Yiddish, belonged to or participated in a Jewish organization, had a Jewish upbringing, were raising their children as Jews or celebrated the Sabbath and major Jewish holidays.

Forty-two percent, however, read the Jewish press often or occasionally (compared to 33 percent in the United States and 60 percent in Canada).

According to Brym and Ryvkina, people over the age of 60 are more involved in Jewish life than those under 60, and Jews in the western part of the now-defunct Soviet Union are less assmilated than those in eastern Ukraine and Russia proper.

In summarizing, they report that about 75 percent of the respondents in their sample do not feel connected to the Jewish community and some 66 percent of them do not wish to have any contact with Jews.

Their findings on anti-Semitism are revealing. Older Moscovites tend to believe there is a global Zionist conspiracy against Russia. Private employers, students and white collar workers with a university education are the least anti-Semitic, while retirees and housewives are the most anti-Semitic.

Most Jews they interviewed do not intend to leave. As they put it: "While Jews who are planning to emigrate are motivated mainly by economic factors, Jews who do not want to emigrate are motivated primarily by a cultural affinity for their homeland."

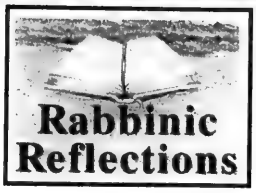
Jews for Judaism



A return to Torah

By RABBI AVRAHAM E. PLOTKIN

Over the last few decades, a massive movement within the Jewish community has been developing: a movement of return to Torah and its observances. Pioneered in the '50s and '60s by Lubavitch, the tshuvah movement today is being facilitated by literally hundreds of organizations and yeshivot around the world and most prominently in Israel.

This return to tradition in the face of the Holocaust and the Jewish communities' ongoing battle with assimilation is nothing less than a modern day miracle and a divine sign that despite the "doom and gloom" forecasters and statisticians who predict Judaism's demise, the truth of the matter is that its spirit is indestructible.

With the advent of the tshuvah movement has come much debate as to what is the most effective approach in communicating the ancient message of Judaism to a 21st-century audience. It is to this debate that I would like to add my own two cents based on the parshah of this week Behalotchah.

The first notable outreach worker after the receiving of the Torah was Aaron hacohen. Aaron's outreach efforts are beautifully described in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of our Fathers 1:12) — "Hillel said: Be of the disciples of Aaron, loving peace and pursuing peace, loving your fellow creatures and bringing them near to the Torah."

Here we see Aaron described primarily as an outreach worker attracting his fellow Jewish brethren closer to the Torah. We also see Aaron's approach as non-discriminatory. Aaron loves his fellow "creatures" and brings "them" closer to Torah. He is non-judgmental with his fellow Jews. Background, affiliation or educational degree are not his criteria. Even when the only quality of potential returnees is that they were created by HaShem, Aaron is prepared to undertake the challenge with love.

Yet Aaron is very focused. While on the one hand he appears extremely tolerant, he is equally uncompromising in Torah. While Aaron brings the people lovingly near the Torah, he does not bring the Torah down or dilute the Torah to meet the needs of the people. This careful balance of sensitivity and strength, although it may seem paradoxical, is truly the key to successful outreach.

And now we turn to the weekly parshah Behalotchah, where we are introduced to one of the most sacred duties of Aaron the cohen — lighting the seven-branch candelabrum in the Holy Temple. The lamps of the menorah, we are taught, are symbolic of the Jewish people and it was Aaron's duty to "light up" the lamps which are symbolic of the soul. The term that is used to describe the light is Behalotchah. Rashi explains that Aaron should light the flames until they become self-sufficient, burning independently.

This again is a very important directive regarding outreach work. It must be done in such a way that returnees are given a sense of self-worth and idependence. They must be given the skills to study on their own, to grow in their Yiddishkeit on their own and not be dependent on the institution that introduced them to their roots in the first place. This often takes greater effort from the institution than from the returnees. The interest must be in lighting the lamps, not in building the institution and adding another member to the membership list.

Tshuvah is not a numbers game. "Whoever saves a single soul is as if an entire world was saved." An entire world must be dealt with accordingly.

We can learn from Aaron's approach what true outreach work is all about. May HaShem very shortly grant us the redemption through Mashiach Tzidkeinu who will complete what Aaron began by gathering each and every Jew out of the exile, speedily in our days. Amen.

Rabbi Plotkin is the spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

Exploring Jewish life on campus

By ZAC KAYE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Guide to Jewish Campus Life provides Jewish students with a comprehensive guide as to what's Jewish on university and college campuses in North America, as well as in Israel and other parts of the world.

Now published by the Princeton review, the guide by Hillel International offers detailed information about whom to contact, the number of Jewish students on each campus, where to get kosher food and the kind of Jewish Studies programs available.

More important than the factual information is the encouragement given to any Jewish student looking for an active involvement in Jewish life on campus, where the student will find it and how such a lifestyle is sustainable.

Using quotes from currently active student leaders, the guide conveys the atmosphere on many campuses, with the suggestion that the greater the number of students, the greater the diversity of the Jewish program.

Hillel International, through its arrangement with the Princeton review, is sending a clear message to potential students that Hillel is worth connecting with. A student is provided with detailed information on "how to do Jewish" on campus (it is important to add from a pluralistic and inclusive perspective), as well as with information on study programs in Israel and opportunities for further study through masters programs in Judaic studies or Jewish communal service.

The reader is encouraged to think positively, not only about connecting with Hillel upon arriving on campus, but also about building an active Jewish life beyond the college years.

The guide is, therefore, more than a list of names and addresses of Hillel foundations. It serves as an indicator of what's possible in Jewish terms on campus. Reflecting the newly found confidence of the Hillel movement, the guide in its latest form becomes an important tool to connect with the over 425,000 Jewish students on university and college campuses in North America.

The casual reader would be surprised by the number of students on many campuses, the diversity of programs and the quality of Jewish life possible. From around the world, Jewish students using this guide can find a place that is welcoming, where the light is always on.

There are, as ever with such a publication, a few disappointments. One is in presentation. The guide is not easy to follow and not as clear in its style as previous volumes. There are also, sadly, many mistakes with regard to personnel, addresses and phone numbers. Hillel is aware of the latter and has promised to correct the errors in a second printing due out in the summer. One of the problems is the constant change in campus staff, which has resulted in many omissions and wrong information being provided, especially about the Toronto campuses.

Despite the problems, the guide is an invaluable resource to any student contemplating going to college and university in Canada and the United States, and even beyond to such countries as Australia, where Sydney now can boast of two Jewish residential houses at its two major universities. The rebirth of Hillel is reflected in the confidence shown in the guide about Jewish life on campus.

The guide is available from Jewish bookstores; further information about the book or campus life in Canada or beyond can be obtained through Jewish Campus Services in Toronto at 416-512-0814.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Jerusalem: One City, Three Faiths by Karen Armstrong, Random House $42

Recently back from a visit to Israel, which included a week in Jerusalem, I turned to this book with understandable anticipation. I admired the author's erudition, her ability to present a multitude of facts in a coherent and popular fashion and her unfailing felicitous prose. But I was disconcerted by the book's final chapters that dealt rather unfairly with modern Israel and its attitude toward Palestinians.

Armstrong traces Jerusalem's physical history and spiritual meaning from its beginnings to its troubled and violent present. In depicting this long saga, she considers its archeology, its ever-changing topography and its hold on the religious imagination of three enduring religious faiths.

There is much to be learned from this astonishing work filled with unusual detail and unfamiliar information. For example, when King Herod extended and renovated the Holy Temple in the first century BCE, he trained a thousand priests as masons. He himself, however, never entered the building by which he would be remembered.

The platform or created mount leading to the Temple took 80 years to complete and involved the labor of 18,000 workers. Some of the stones of the supporting walls weighed between two and five tons. The western supporting wall — the only one now standing — originally measured some 350 yards. From the distance, the Temple Mount was a brilliant spectacle: "It seemed like a mountain covered in snow, for the only part not covered in gold was dazzlingly white."

For Muslims, Jerusalem is holy because of the tradition that Mohammed visited the city, conveyed there miraculously from Mecca by God. Accompanied by the angel Gabriel, Mohammed on his winged horse alighted on the mount, where he ascended through seven heavens to the divine throne.

The book, otherwise brilliant, is marred by its one-sided analysis of current events affecting Jerusalem. In discussing the 1967 war, the author suggests that Jordan was drawn "inevitably" into the conflict. She does not mention that Israel sent messages to King Hussein asking him to stay out of the war, or that during the war, Israel took most of its casualties while taking the Old City because of a decision not to use heavy armor which might damage the holy places.

The author suggests that even Teddy Kollek, longtime mayor of Jerusalem and regarded as liberal and tolerant, did not treat Palestinians fairly in terms of proper housing, fair employment and equal education.

When you look back over time, you discover that only Jews have protected the holy places of Jerusalem. When the Temple was destroyed by the Romans they levelled it and built a Temple to Jupiter. When the Roman Empire became Christian, the emperors levelled the pagan temple and built a church. When the Arabs conquered Jerusalem, they levelled the church and built a mosque. When the Crusaders conquered Jerusalem, they levelled the mosque and built a church. When the Arabs reconquered Jerusalem, they levelled the church and built the El-Aksa Mosque. When the Jews took Jerusalem, they protected the Mosque and the Dome of the Rock and not only guaranteed freedom of access, but also gave the various religious orders sovereignty of their shrines.

The author concludes that peace will not come to Jerusalem until some accommodation is made with the claims of the Palestinians.

Being a mentsh on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So far on the Jewish Highway, we have toured the world with ease. But in reality, the information on our voyages has been making one-way trips. All we have done is send out requests and have data returned to us. However, information on the Jewish Highway travels both ways. Not only can you be a recipient, you can make yourself heard, too.

In the coming weeks, we are going to take a look at two of the most powerful and popular ways you can share your own information and opinions – through Newsgroups and through Electronic Mailing Lists.

You will be amazed to find how many people around the world share the same beliefs or passions as you ... and how many others disagree with you vehemently. And that all of them are ready and waiting to talk to you. But before you can seek them out, you need to know the rules of the road. These rules are usually referred to as Internet Etiquette or "Netiquette" – or how to write like a mentsh when 50 million people are listening.

"When thou enter a city abide by its customs" – the Talmud.

Douglas Crispen quotes that piece of advice in his essay on Netiquette [http://bcn.boulder.co.us/help/Roadmap/msg10.html].

There are millions of Internet users out there, many of them cranky, and if you don't want to get burned, know the ground rules. Arlene Rinaldi has compiled one of the best primers called The Net: User Guidelines and Netiquette, with a succinct chapter on Electronic Communications [http://www.fau.edu/rinaldi/net/elec.html].

For example, did you know that it is considered very poor manners to write your message in capital letters BECAUSE PEOPLE WILL THINK YOU'RE SHOUTING!

Another big mistake is wading into the waters of debate or asking questions that have already been answered. To get you up to speed, most newsgroups compile something called an FAQ or Frequently Asked Questions file. Read it.

One of the largest Jewish discussion areas is a newsgroup called [news:soc.culture.jewish]. There, almost any issue related to Judaism is fair game. But not if it has already been addressed in its FAQ [http://www.cis.ohio-state.edu/hypertext/faq/usenet/judaism/FAQ/top.html]. Browse through this FAQ and you'll find brief discussions on such issues as the Conservative view of the role of women in Judaism [http://www.cis.ohio-state.edu/hypertext/faq/usenet/judaism/FAQ/04-Observance/faq-doc-20.html] or a look at the differences between Sephardim and Ashkenazim [http://www.cis.ohio-state.edu/hypertext/faq/usenet/judaism/FAQ/07-Jews-As-Nation/faq-doc-3.html].

So now that you've brushed up on your Netiquette and read all the FAQs, you're finally ready to dash off a message and get that point off your chest.

Not quite. In the disembodied and often combative atmosphere of the Internet, it is very easy to get worked up about a topic and send off an angry message ... which you may soon regret. Earlier this century, Rabbi Yisrael Meyer Kagan, better known as the Chafetz Chaim, grew to prominence because of his focus on the power of words and the hurt they can cause. In his book Shmirat HaLashon – Guarding Your Tongue [http://www.torah.org/learning/gossip/index.html] the Chafetz Chaim warns not only against gossip and slander but against harmful or negative speech.

In a time when words can travel around the world in seconds, and where the Internet can be used to build bridges or create misunderstandings, the Chafetz Chaim's writings seem more relevant than ever.

ספר חדש: "מלאכי עליון"

וזה קראה ספר חדש, וביקשתי ממנה להעלות על הכתב את התרשמויותיה. גם אתם מוזמנים לעשות כך, ואני מבטיח לפרסם. אז ככה מדווחת וָזה: " מיכל שלו, בשנות השלושים לחייה, היתה עורכת דין עד אשר תקף אותה חיידק הסופרים, נטלה חופשה ממקצועה והתיישבה לכתוב ספר. "מלאכי עליון" היא קראה לו. מבקרי הספרות בישראל כינו את מיכל שלו: "התשובה הנשית לרם אורן". הספר כתוב בעברית מדוברת, כזו שאפשר לשמוע ברחוב, כזו שמדברים בה ה"חברה", ועוסק ביחסים המורכבים ביחידת טיסי קרב בצה"ל. העלילה משתרעת על פני שבועות ספורים ומקפלת בתוכה סיפורים מהווי היחידה, אהבה, קנאה, תשוקה- הכל יש בספר בכמויות מדויקות. כמעט לפי נוסחה קבועה מראש להצלחה. יש ואתה צוחק מן הבדיחות ולפעמים (כשצריך) גם מזיל דמעה. אבל בעיקר מרגיש כאחד מהחֶבְרה. כבר בעמוד הראשון, למעשה מן השורות הראשונות עברה בי ההרגשה כי טוב שצפיתי בזמנו בסרט TOP GUN (עם תום קרוז) . הסרט עזר לי להיכנס לתמונות המתארות נסיקת מטוסי קרב לשחקים, יירוט מטוסים, שיחות במכשירי הקשר בין הצוותים, תאורי נוף עוצרי נשימה ועוד. ואם כבר סרטים, זוכרים את הקטע בסרט "אישה יפה" (PRETTY WOMAN) בו נכנסת ג'וליה רוברטס לחנות הבגדים היוקרתית וזוכה ליחס מזלזל מצד המוכרות בחנות, עד שמגיע ריצ'ארד גיר ומבהיר לכולם שהיא איתו ואז מתחפך הגלגל ומשרתים אותה בכבוד ובחנופה? גם ב"מלאכי עליון" יש תיאור מצב כזה, רק שהחנות היוקרתית נמצאת בכיכר המדינה בתל אביב ואילו הגיבורים הם זיו, הטייס החתיך, גיבור הספר, ואהובתו קטיה, הנערה הפשוטה, עולה חדשה מרוסיה. בכלל יש בספר הזה הרבה רגעים בהם יש את ההרגשה הזו, שהקטע הזה כבר מוכר מאיזה שהוא מקום. למרות זאת ואולי דווקא לכן, בהחלט כדאי להעביר כמה שעות טובות בחברת הספר הזה".

סרטים מומלצים

שלושה סרטים מומלצים, ואם כבר הספקתם להכיר אותי קצת אתם מנחשים שכמעט בטוח שהם לא אמריקניים. ANGLES AND INSECTS הוא סרט בריטי שמותאר את מפגש התרבויות בין זואולוג מתמחה בחרקים, בן העם הפשוט, למשפחת אצולה בריטית. הוא, בעל הדם האדום הפשוט, איש משכיל, רגיש ויפה נפש. והם, בעלי הדם הכחול, אנשים מנוונים, חסרי תרבות, גועניים ובהמות ממש. אני מנוע מלספר לכם יותר, כדי לא להרוס לכם את הכיף, אבל תצטערו שהסרט יסתיים. ANTONIAS LINE הוא הסרט ההולנדי שזכה באוסקר לסרט הזר, סיפור של חמש דורות ששל נשים, במשפחה הולנדית. במרכז העלילה עומדים חייה של אנטוניה, ודרכה מראים את אימה, ביתה, נכדתה וניניתה. כולן נשים חזקות, מיוחדות, עצמאיות, שצריכות את הגברים רק בצורה שולית. יש בסרט הרבה חוש הומור לצד דקות דומעות, ולמרות היותו דובר הולנדית עובר הטקסט בצורה נפלאה, ובעיקר יש בו אמירה מאוד חזקה, שנשים צריכות להיות עצמאיות ולהתחבר לגברים מתוך רצון ולא מכורח. אחרון חביב- הפתעה נעימה, אחרי מלחמת המפרץ קראתי כמו כולם את סיפרה של עירית לינור "שירת הסירנה" והתאכזבתי, אולי מתוך שהיה זה אחד הספרים הראשונים בגל גדול של " רומן רומנטי" תוצרת ישראל. עד אז חשבנו שספר ישראלי צריך איכויות כמו של עמוס עוז, דויד גרוסמן א.ב. יהושע. והינה עכשיו מסתבר שהתנגרמלות של ישראל (הפיכתה לנורמאלית) כוללת גם ספרי "רומן רומנטי" שעד כה היו מתורגמים מאנגלית. חלפו מספר שנים, ויצא הסרט "שירת הסירנה". לאור אכזבתי מהספר ישבתי לראות את הסרט בדחילו וחיכיתי לצפייה של עשרים דקות שאחריהן אסגור עניין. אלא מה - הסרט ממש כיף! כל המגרעות והשטחיות של הספר הפכו ליתרונות בסרט. תסריט אמין, (שנכתב על ידי הסופרת), טקסט עם הרבה חוש הומור ובהחלט משכנע. נראה כמו סרט אמריקני רגיל עם כל מעלותיו ומגרעותיו. ולנו, הישראלים יושבי חוץ (יענו יורדים) מביא הסרט את אווירת האימים של המלחמה עם החיוך של שנים אחר-כך.

Ohr Somayach says goodbye to Rabbi Becher

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a bittersweet evening, as over 300 friends, colleagues and students paid tribute and said goodbye last week to Rabbi Mordechai Becher, the popular senior lecturer of Ohr Somayach.

The social hall of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill reverberated with people swapping stories about his sense of humour, excellence in teaching, and, especially, mentshlechkeit.

Rabbi Becher, originally from Australia, was sent to Toronto from the Ohr Somayach headquarters in Jerusalem four years ago, after the death of Rabbi Uziel Milevsky.

He, his wife Chavi and their children are returning to Jerusalem this summer.

Rabbi Yisroel Rakowsky, lecturer and founding dean of Ohr Somayach in Monsey, N. Y., praised Rabbi Becher as being "great in Torah learning and in the character that goes with that."

He said that the ultimate redemption will come through the merits of the baalei tshuvah, those who return to religious observance. Rabbi Becher, who "brought people back to Torah," has thus helped this process.

Chair Howard Sitzer called the rabbi a "special person, who makes every subject fascinating."

When he began studying with Rabbi Becher, he said, "like many others, I knew nothing [about Judaism]. No question was too silly. He was always there to support me."

Calling herself an unabashed "Becher groupie," Chaya Chapley, who is on the office staff of Ohr Somayach, said, "He treats everyone with mentshlechkeit, with dignity. He represents Torah from the inside out."

Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of the host congregation, said that Rabbi Becher "raised us to great heights through his understanding of Torah and his love of HaShem."

There was even a "roast," as Michael Lebovic read fake telegrams from Australia and Israel.

An emotional Rabbi Avram Rothman, executive director of Ohr Somayach, presented Rabbi Becher with a new edition of the Talmud.

The audience exploded in laughter when, before responding, Rabbi Becher had his children pass out printed outlines, which are a usual feature of his lectures.

He received a standing ovation.

The evening concluded with refreshments, music and socializing.

Beth Tzedec project aimed at helping Israeli victims of terror

TORONTO — Beth Tzedec Congregations's Israel action committee is trying to help Israeli victims of terror by sponsoring a program dealing with post-traumatic stress disorder.

The project, committee chair Dr. Rose Geist told The CJN, is being directed by Dr. Giora Kreinen, chief psychologist at the University of Tel Aviv and an expert, says Geist, in the treatment of trauma and post-traumatic stress disorder.

Kreinen and his colleagues plan to create training programs to equip mental health professionals to work with adult and child terror victims and their families. He will also hold conferences to help the professional groups who work in crisis situations, such as emergency rescue crews.

"They themselves are often highly traumatized and require support and treatment," Geist said.

She added that the media, in its effort to communicate the drama of terrorism, sometimes creates even more fear and panic among both the victims of terrorism and the general population. Kreinen plans to try to re-educate the media to communicate the news in a less potentially harmful manner.

A program to raise funds for Kreinen's work will be held at the synagogue on June 12, at 7:15. Stephen Berk, a historian at Union College will speak on Terror into Zion: the Hamas, Hezbollah and the Terror Against the Jews.

Supporting Kreinen's work is part of the Beth Tzedec Israel action committee's interest in helping with the psychological support and treatment of victims of terror and their families.

For more information, call Beth Tzedec, 416-781-3511.

Associated's Tannenbaum retires after 22 years

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Schools just won't look the same.

Arthur Tannenbaum, executive administrator from 1974 to 1975, executive director until 1982 and executive vice-president since then, is retiring at the end of this school year.

Over the years, he has managed to eliminate the deficit the school had accumulated when he arrived; he revised the constitution, was instrumental in building the Danilack branch on Leslie and the Kamin Centre in Thornhill and raised funds, according to an article in a recent school journal, like a "driving juggernaut."

Arthur Tannenbaum

He was deeply involved in working out an arrangement with Vaughan Council, in which land set aside but not being used for schools was assigned to Or Haemet, Leo Baeck, Netivot Haorah and Associated, so that they could build in the new community in Thornhill.

Along the way, he was appointed as a justice of the peace and sits in traffic court three nights a week, so as not to interfere with his work at Associated.

The New York-born Tannenbaum reminisced about coming to Toronto. He had served as an administrator at Yeshiva University and at several synagogues, and as a director of an anti-poverty program, when Sam Shainhouse, one of the most active backers and workers for the school contacted him.

"He asked me if I had ever heard of the school. I said no. Then he asked me if I wanted to work for it. I said no — I was perfectly happy where I was."

Shainhouse persuaded him to come for an interview and the rest, as they say, is history — especially after he noticed a sign in a store window advertising cholent for Shabbat. "That's what sold me on Toronto."

It is Shainhouse's philosophy that drives Tannenbaum. "He told me that a deficit won't bankrupt us. Only no children [attending the school] will. Picture the meaning, the love in those words."

Tannenbaum has a tremendous affection for the school and the people he works with.

"I never felt like an employee. Associated is my life and I cared and worked for it day and night."

He mused that he will "miss Associated desperately. The people here have been so kind to me and my wife Bina. And in return, I hope I've treated people the way I wanted to be treated — with respect."

Tannenbaum said he feels he has had a positive role in the financial, structural and organizational growth of the school.

"That is easy," he said, when "you have a lay body absolutely and totally committed to the survival of the school," as well as a "tremendous professional staff, each one better than the next."

The challenges that the school will face in the next few years, he believes, revolve around the reduction of funds coming from Federation ("I'm not complaining about that — it's just a fact") and a higher rate of subsidized students.

"As more parents are out of work or divorced, as it gets harder and harder to meet personal and educational obligations, the school has to do everything it can to keep tuition low, while still providing the finest education.

"We have an obligation to reach the maximum number of boys and girls and to do everything necessary to ensure that they stay in the day school system."

Tannenbaum doesn't plan to rest on his laurels when he retires.

Besides keeping on with his work as justice of the peace, he plans to work as a volunteer consultant to a Jewish organization.

How to start a family tradition.

When it comes to helping make the community a better place to live, our family has always looked for the most beneficial ways of giving. We want to be able to use our good fortune to do the most possible for the organizations in which we believe. That's why we choose to give to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital through the Double Mitzvah program.*

Through the Double Mitzvah, our gift helps two recipients. We buy State of Israel Bonds in the name of Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation. The hospital earns interest each year before converting the Bonds into cash at maturity. Until then, the cash is used in Israel. We receive the same donation receipt as if we had donated cash. That way, our donation works twice — once to help support Israel and once again to contribute to the work of Mount Sinai.

And just about anyone can do it. Even a modest gift can go a long way towards supporting a hospital that provides inspired teaching and the best research and medical care in the world.

Not a bad way to start a family tradition.

Judaism plays a key role in David Frum's world view

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In many of his essays and articles, David Frum loves to employ historical analogies to comment on current situations.

It should therefore come as no surprise that the prolific writer and neo-conservative ideologue should find a World War II parallel to the plight of Jews today.

Jewish organizational life is something like the British defences at Singapore, he said in a recent interview. Expecting an amphibious attack, the British trained their guns seaward, ready to blast their enemy as they approached.

Instead, the Japanese marched their men through a swamp and came up on the British positions from the rear.

Similarly, Jewish communal organizations are poised to react to the dangers posed by rightwing anti-Semitism when the real danger to the community comes from an entirely different direction. Intermarriage rates approaching 50 per cent (in the United States) and the belief that ethnicity alone will protect Jews could, in fact, do them in, he says.

David Frum

Furthermore, it's not the rightwing that poises the greatest threat to Jews. A more serious challenge is likely to come from the left wing, from Quebec and third world intellectuals or from Swedish social democrats who "make a fetish" out of trying to prevent kosher slaughter, he says.

A prolific essayist and political commentator, Frum is author of What's Right: The New Conservatism and What it Means for Canada, published by Random House.

The book is a collection of his newspaper and magazine articles from the past several years, focusing on U.S. and Canadian politics and social issues.

While only two of the articles have specifically Jewish themes — one is on Chanukah, the other on Passover — Frum says Judaism premeates his views on current topics, including welfare.

Judaism, he says, is not hostile to work or prosperity as long as people meet their charitable requirements.

"In Maimonides' eight steps of charity, what we now call welfare ranks close to the bottom," he says. "It's hard to make a Jewish case for a system where [people] remain dependant on the state for generation after generation" regardless of economic conditions.

A firm believer in the free market, reducing the powers of government, lowering taxes and strengthening the nuclear family, Frum is for many one of the leading lights of the new conservatism.

One critic, however, in his review of Frum's book referred to him "a mascot" for the "neo-con boy's club of well-fed navel-gazers."

Whichever way he's seen, from his own perspective, Frum contends his political stance is a natural outgrowth of his Jewish heritage. Respect for family life, belief that the search for God requires discipline and effort, as do other worthwhile endeavors, and the sense that life is about making the best available choices derive from his upbringing in a Jewish home, he says.

So what about the widespread perception that Jews have historically favored liberal and leftwing causes, not rightwing ones.

Frum acknowledges that historically that was the case, but adds there was a reason for it. Up to World War II, he says, the enemies of the Jews generally came from the political and clerical right, so it was natural for Jews to gravitate to the left.

But "you cannot say I'm a liberal because Judaism and its ethics require it...When today some Jews advocate statism, welfare dependency, moral relativism, they're not doing it due to Jewish ethics." Judaism, he continues, recognizes that charity must be combined with self-reliance and its ethic is based on personal and sexual morality.

A graduate of Yale University and Harvard Law School, Frum, 36, writes a column in The Financial Post and is a contributing editor for The Weekly Standard.

He and his wife, Danielle Crittenden, a convert to Judaism, send their two children to a Jewish day school.

Frum was one of the organizers of the recent Winds of Change conference in Calgary in which conservatives discussed policy issues.

Probe to examine judges over war crimes case

TORONTO — Two judges of the Federal Court of Canada and a senior Justice Department official will be investigated for closed door meetings in a case involving three alleged Nazi war criminals.

Federal Justice Minister Allan Rock appointed former Ontario chief justice Charles Dubin to probe the meeting between Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac and Assistant Deputy Justice Minister Ted Thompson. The Canadian Judicial Council has asked the two judges to explain their conduct.

The controversy arose over a meeting between Thompson and Isaac, in which Thompson complained about the slow pace of proceedings in cases involving alleged war criminals. Isaac then met with James Jerome, the presiding judge in the case.

Jerome withdrew from the case, but lawyers representing the alleged war criminals brought a motion for a stay of proceedings. That motion is still before Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen, who took over from Jerome.

Tremonti keeps head down in action-filled Middle East

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Anna Maria Tremonti

TORONTO — Despite appearances to the contrary (shots of her in a flak jacket, calmly doing a stand-up within the sound of mortarfire), Anna Maria Tremonti insists she's "just a big chicken."

"I don't like gunfire. I like to avoid the frontlines," says CBC television's high-profile Middle East correspondent. "But you go back to these places, like Bosnia and Lebanon, not because of the drama, but because of the people. You feel you have an obligation to them."

Tremonti, who won CBC TV's coveted Mideast post last July, is a regular on The National, as well as on Newsworld, the all-news channel, reporting from Israel, Palestinian-administered territories and neighboring countries. With this year's spate of suicide bombings, the breakneck pace of peace negotiations, Israel's incursion into Lebanon, and last week's cliffhanger elections that kept journalists jumping for weeks, the 38-year-old reporter barely has time to take a breath.

"It's a busy place all right," Tremonti told The CJN during a recent Toronto stopover. "It was a post I wanted, and I knew what I was in for."

Tremonti had been "in and out" of Israel for five years prior to her posting, occasionally covering for colleague Paul Workman. She had also covered the early days of the Palestinian intifadah. On her first day, she was hit on the head with a rock.

A native of Windsor, Tremonti came to the Mideast after postings in London, Berlin and Bosnia, where she won a Gemini Award for her reporting. She also covered the 1991 coup in Moscow that toppled Mikhail Gorbachev.

"Wherever I go, there's trouble," she chuckles. "But covering conflict is interesting. After Bosnia, Israel is so much more ordered and calm."

What strikes Tremonti most about Israel is the never-ending politics.

"The discussions never end. Politics are such an integral part of life. We live in a country [Canada] where politicians trip over each other to move to the centre. In Israel, they actually take sides. To me, it's fascinating."

But Tremonti fears that last week's elections will polarize Israelis even more, between those who backed Shimon Peres's march to peace and what she calls Benjamin Netanyahu's "more cautious and suspicious" approach.

Tremonti doesn't believe Operation Grapes of Wrath, Israel's recent bombing and strafing of Hezbollah positions inside Lebanon, will cause any lasting damage to its image or to the peace process. [The CJN's interview, however, was conduoted prior to allegations that Israel's bombing of a UN base housing Lebanese refugees, resulting in almost 100 deaths, was likely no error].

"The fighting caused a lot more damage on the Lebanese side than the Israeli side," she notes. "But as soon as [the base] was bombed, we saw a ceasefire. And I don't think that was a coincidence."

Tremonti spends a lot of time speaking to Palestinians on the street, and encounters much "suspicion" of both Peres and Netanyahu. As for average Israelis, "it's not that they trust Yasser Arafat. They trusted Yitzhak Rabin to deal with Yasser Arafat. But Israelis are terribly politically astute. It's an informed electorate."

Unlike a lot of American coverage, the CBC, she says, wants context in its reporting. "Right away, that changes a lot of my coverage. I can do longer pieces," which often go beyond the quick soundbite or bit of sensational footage.

Tremonti lives in Jerusalem and on her rare days off, "I veg out. Sometimes, I just lie in a hammock. It's such an intense place." On the other hand, "I'm in no hurry to leave. For a reporter, there's no better place to be."

Bialik co-founder honored

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "For my father, Bialik was a mission, the answer for Jewish survival," said Arny Sokoloff, son of Julie Sokoloff, at a gala dinner recently held at Inn on the Park in memory of the co-founder of Bialik Hebrew Day School and in honor of the school's 35th anniversary.

Among the heartfelt tributes to the pharmacist, who died last Aug. 13 at age 74, was one by philanthropist Leslie Dan, president of Novopharm, whose first office was the storage room behind Sokoloff's pharmacy at Euclid Avenue and College Street in 1956. It was from there Dan sent out his first international medical gift packages.

The crowd of 450 listened as Dan recalled that one day a customer asked Sokoloff if a very expensive ulcer remedy would help him.

"I don't know if it will help you, but if I make the sale it will help me," Sokoloff replied.

Another time, Dan recounted, a well-known kvetch complained that there was a mistake in the proshkes (powdered medication), because her husband had not shvitzed (perspired).

"Maybe your husband perspired while you slept," Sokoloff told her. "Don't make jokes with me, young man," she said, to which he responded: "Okay, let's make a deal. I won't tell you how to make borsht soup and you won't tell me how to make proshkes."

Other tributes to the man who used his sense of humor to promote Jewish education and lived to see the Bialik enrolment grow from 33 students to 800 came from gala chair Judy Hendler and Bialik president Barry Waltman. The Bialik choir sang some of Sokoloff's favorites.

Dan said Sokoloff went to sleep at night listening to his father read from Yiddish newspapers and early developed a sense of social justice from his teachers, Joshop Altman and Avraham Shkop.

He said Sokoloff was one of three University of Toronto students who confronted then university president Sidney Smith with a charge of bias against Jewish dental applicants because they were said to lack physical dexterity. The university later lifted the ban.

Sokoloff also showed an early dedication to the Labor Zionist cause, Dan said.

Arny Sokoloff said that in the final week of his life, his father told the family — his wife Anne and their children Ellen and Arny — that Bialik's planned northern extension must be realized.

And in fact, among the patrons of the expansion was Julie's wife Anne Sokoloff, the former Anne Willer, who, Arny said, often described Bialik as her third child.

THE BEST SAVINGS GUARANTEED
NO MATTER WHERE OR WHEN YOU CALL.

Wish you could spend more time calling friends or family overseas? Switch to Sprint Canada.

Compared to your local telephone company's calling plan, THE MOST savings plan always gives you the best monthly savings, wherever or whenever you call. Guaranteed.

Here's how. With THE MOST savings plan you save 50% off the three numbers you spend the most on each month: one overseas, one in Canada, and one in the U.S.

If you don't call overseas, or if you happen to spend more calling a second number in Canada, then you save 50% off the two numbers you spend the most on in Canada and one number in the U.S.

Either way, it's automatic. And you always save 15% off all your other calls. So wherever you spend the most, you save the most.

It's true: you can afford to talk for twice as long with friends and family. Call Sprint Canada today.

Let's say you spend the most calling a friend or relative in Israel. Your local telephone company's best rate, $1.48 per minute, (excluding first minute) is for calls made between 1a.m. and 6a.m. The same call with Sprint Canada on the other hand, is only 74¢ a minute (excluding first minute) – half the price!

LOCAL PHONE CO.'S BEST RATES:

Hamilton rabbi retiring after 30 years

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A gala weekend will honor Rabbi Israel Silverman on his retirement after 30 years as spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Congregation.

On June 8, a special Shabbat service to which the entire community is invited will be followed by a kiddush sponsored by past presidents and the congregation. On the evening of June 9, there will be a gala dinner.

Guest speaker on Shabbat will be Rabbi Morton M. Leifman, vice-president of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, who will present Rabbi Silverman with the Max Arzt Memorial Distinguished Rabbinic Service Award.

"A man of quiet dignity, a dedicated leader and advisor to our congregation," as former Beth Jacob sisterhood president Joy Foster describes him, Rabbi Silverman is known and respected as a theologian, scholar and educator.

In the general community, the rabbi has contributed to the understanding and acceptance of Judaism through lectures to school and church groups.

A native of Montreal, Rabbi Silverman was educated at the Talmud Torah and Baron Byng High School. He graduated from Sir George Williams College with a general arts degree.

A gold medallist and member of the second graduating class of the old Montreal Hebrew Teachers College, he taught at the Shaare Zion Hebrew School and subsequently entered rabbinical studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

He was ordained in 1964 and after a year as assistant rabbi at Temple Beth-El on Long Island, was appointed rabbi of Temple Beth Zion in Brookline, Mass.

Rabbi Silverman has lectured on Judaic Studies and Hebrew literature at the Hebrew Teachers College in Boston. From 1961 to 1964, he served as president of the New England Region Rabbinical Assembly. He is a fellow of the National Beth Din, Jewish Theololgical Seminary, which conferred an honorary doctor of divinity degree on him in 1980, and he is a past chair of the Rabbinical Assembly Committee on Jewish Law and Standards.

Rabbi Silverman intends to "stay put and see how things evolve," but part of the summer will be spent as usual at Camp Ramah, with which he and his wife have been associated for many years.

Passover import agreement pending

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Barring an 11th-hour obstacle, the final wording of a written agreement on future Passover imports was expected to be hammered out early this week between the Jewish community and the Office de la Langue Francaise (OLF).

And if the wording satisfies B'nai Brith (BB), the organization will likely abandon its planned court action to protect future Passover imports, the lawyer for the firm preparing the case said.

The June 3 meeting between Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) and the OLF — the third since the task force was announced April 12 — will guarantee in writing that Passover imports are legally exempted from French-labelling laws, said David Sultan, CJC-Q's community relations director.

"We're ready to sign," he said last week.

"My sense tells me that things will be signed at the next meeting. I'm very confident."

The OLF "has been very, very receptive," Sultan added.

Lawyer and B'nai Brith member Gregory Bordan, whose firm, Ogilvy Renaud, has been laying the groundwork for the court action, said BB would likely drop the case if the signed deal "makes clear that the sale of imported Passover food can continue as a legal activity."

Although the decision to pursue or abandon the case is B'nai Brith's, Bordan said, "clearly, there would be no need for [pursuing] it" if the written agreement resolves the dispute to BB's satisfaction.

Sultan said in "tachlis" terms, the joint agreement's wording will explicitly recognize a regulation of Quebec's Language Charter as applying to imported Passover foods on a "long-term" basis, thereby recognizing that the "exception always existed in law."

The regulation, article 5(c), exempts imported products from French-labeling laws if they are in "limited use" — a characterization previously seen by the OLF as not applying to Passover imports.

Moreover, the document will provide for the exemption to apply for a 68-day period — 30 days counted from the time Passover products are stocked on shelves, the eight-day Passover period, and for 30 days following the holiday.

As part of the deal, CJC-Q and Montreal's regulatory body for kashrut, the Vaad Ha'ir (Jewish Community Council), will work together to ensure that local producers of kosher Passover goods use French labelling.

Bordan, for his part, reserved judgement on the deal until he had a chance to scrutinize the promised document.

"We've had 'agreements' before," he said.

"We don't want a situation where we will be 'allowed' to commit an 'illegal' act. Our position has been that it's already legal.

"Right now we have the mandate to go ahead [with the case]," Bordan said.

Bordan felt that if an agreement was reached this week, the threat of a B'nai Brith suit — even if eventually abandoned — may have played a part.

"It it's helped get the OLF to recognize that under current law Passover imports are fully protected and legal, then it's been very useful," he said.

Singers add special touch to a simchah

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Independent singer Faye Kellerstein (633-6558) and Fern Lindzon of the Fern Lindzon Band (445-9780) agree that a singer adds a special touch to a simchah. Whether you hire an independent singer or a band with vocalists, there are things to look for before making your choice.

With some exceptions, singers are hired with a band. This is usually the case, even with vocalists who work independently. At weddings, for example, a band often works with "floating singers," who are not permanent members. If you hire a singer independently, you will want to know how well he or she will work with other musicians and background vocalists.

There are singers for every kind of song: Yiddish, klezmer, Hebrew, Ladino, jazz, rock, arias, standards. A good singer has a wide repertoire – and stays "fresh" by adding to it, but love of one's work and the ability to respond to the feelings of the guests are just as important.

Singer must adapt

Lindzon holds that singers should be able to project themselves into the room, as if they were guests, in order to get a feel for the ambience. Except for dances, she advises against a set song list; the singer must adapt to shifts of mood, and unpredictable factors like requests and sing-alongs.

The voice is the major vehicle of emotion and always tends to stand out. For this reason, Lindzon says, there is a time and place for different kinds of vocals. Mellow songs are best during a meal, but at cocktail time, when singing might distract from conversation, upbeat, unobtrusive instrumentals are best. Later, lively vocals entice people onto the dance floor.

Kellerstein and Lindzon both emphasize that the only way to evaluate a singer is live, in person. A tape can be edited and does not show what kind of energy the singer projects or how he or she interacts spontaneously with an audience, where there is no chance to edit.

Kellerstein also makes the point that good music and singing have nothing to do with loudness. If music is too loud, no conversation is possible; and guests want to talk without having to shout – especially at an event like a wedding, where people who haven't met in years are renewing acquaintances.

Faye Kellerstein

It may also be useful to check whether your singer has specific abilities, like being able to perform a capella (without instrumental accompaniment) or to train a choir. Kellerstein tells of training friends of a bar mitzvah boy's father to sing a capella, so that they could sing for people to dance to on Shabbat afternoon in an Orthodox shul.

A singer invests in wardrobe, promotions, music and the like; moreover, singing is strenuous, both in performance and rehearsal. Accordingly, says Kellerstein, people should be ready to pay for quality. After all, you pay more for a live play than for a movie.

Three or four months in advance is not too early to book, says Kellerstein. for a Sunday night, eight months to a year is not too early; but for a mid-week event, three months ahead should be safe. Book your singer, advises Lindzon, at the same time you book your band.

PARTY PLANNER

A special invitation for all

Calligraphy is an art

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

How will you decide who does the invitations for your party? Probably, you will want a calligrapher – and there are only a few in Toronto.

Terri Kirshenbaum of Invitation House (416-593-0519) points out that, attractive as good handwriting is, it is not the same as calligraphy, any more than being able to carry a tune in your local choir is the same as being a professional singer. Calligraphy is an art in its own right.

Before deciding who will do your invitations, advises Kirshenbaum, get a professional to walk you through your options.

Barbara Mortfield of Barbara Mortfield Invitations (905-738-1232) adds that it is important to look for integrity, experience, artistic talent and up-to-date technical knowledge, and for someone who enjoys the work.

Mortfield also suggests looking at an invitation studio's connection to other aspects of the simchah business. Trade shows for party planners, coordinators and those who work with them have resulted in a great deal of networking, which has tangible benefits, such as better, faster service from suppliers.

Calligraphy and choice of script are not the only factors to consider. Color of ink and type of paper for cards and envelopes are also important. For Mortfield, in fact, calligraphy is part of a larger invitation package. On the technical side, she observes that while there is still a market for engraving, it has lost much of its popularity to thermo-engraving, which looks the same but costs half as much.

Budget is also important. Costs can run from $65 for 100 printed invitations to $500 for the same number of engraved. Few people buy invitations alone, however, says Mortfield. A total package for a wedding or bar mitzvah, which includes invitations, RSVP cards, thank-you cards and seating cards, can cost from $300 to $1,500.

When you choose any professional, you want to be personally looked after. A distinctive invitation sets the mood and tone of the party in advance. Kirshenbaum and Mortfield agree that there is no limit to how much customization is possible.

A good invitation studio will hand address envelopes and custom calligraph place cards for the tables. Personalized paper napkins for the cocktail hour are quite common.

Mortfield sees a current shift to the "less is more" school of thought: the more elegant the wedding, the simpler the invitation. Whether this is a passing vogue or long-term trend, she is not sure.

Wedding invitations, Kirshenbaum says, should be mailed five weeks ahead to people in town, six weeks to those out of town; if your event is a daytime event, or takes place in summer or holidays, allow still more time.

Allow one to six weeks for printing the invitations; if you want a whole package, says Mortfield, speak to the invitation studio about four months before the event, or as soon as you have finalized the details of place, date and time.

Pre-wedding spa package offers relaxation & peace

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

What better present to give a bride and groom than a chance to relax and rejuvenate themselves before the big day? With a gift certificate to a spa, you are offering the happy couple a chance to get away from the everyday pace and take a break from it all.

The Spa at Hazelton (922-9226) offers a bride and groom package suitable for every couple and for every budget.

"Here at the spa we make our guests feel relaxed and give them peace of mind," says Suzanne Leduc Aylen, director of marketing and public relations.

One three-hour package, could have the bride enjoying a deep cleansing facial, a French manicure, a hair consultation and a pedicure, while her fiancé is treated to a hydrotherapy bath, an anti-stress massage with essential oils, a shampoo, haircut and style and manicure. In another three-hour session, both the bride and groom could take a hydrotherapy bath, an exfoliating body scrub and wrap and a facial. Spa beverages and snacks are offered during the treatment.

"These treatments make every bride and groom feel special," says Aylen. "At the spa, we have developed a number of techniques such as different body wraps which are effective in the treatment of problems such as cellulite, excess fat, localized fat pockets, water retention and lack of firmness. The applications are based on a combination of essential oils, trace elements and minerals in combination with medicated algae.

"The body scrub is truly invigorating. Ingredients such as sea salt, trace elements, minerals and sea oils help rejuvenate skin by removing dead cells and increasing circulation. They also improve color and re-mineralize skin. This treatment is recommended for all skin types but especially after sun exposure, which results in dehydrated and flaky skin. What could make a couple feel and look better?"

The Spa at Hazelton offers relaxing massages using aromatherapy, shiatsu or acupressure and Swedish massage.

"In aromatherapy we use the essence of Life Force, which is distilled from leaves, fruits, blossoms, seeds or roots and bark of aromatic plants. Shiatsu means finger pressure and is also referred to as acupressure or acupuncture without needles. Therapists using Swedish massage use a variety of therapies and techniques depending on your requirements. These could include hydrotherapy, heat lamps and remedial as well as postural exercises," Aylen explains.

The Uptown Spa (449-4044) also offers pampering packages perfect for the bride or groom. A deluxe spa day includes a sauna, massage, facial and neck treatment, manicure, pedicure and makeup, hair style and lunch. Its Two's Company package treats the bride and groom to a massage, facial, hair style and lunch.

Check rental company's track record

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you choose a party rental service, you will want to check the company's track record, as you would with any other business. Who do you know who has used its services? What do they say about it?

Then come more specific questions. Your choice of a rental service affects the atmosphere of your event. Some services specialize in items like drapes and linen, which change the decor of a room. Others are oriented to utility and convenience, offering everything from extension cords to coat racks. There are companies which rent all items, both useful and beautiful – and others which only rent one item, like decorations.

First, you must decide whether you want the decor to be a visible part of the atmosphere or so unobtrusive it is only a background for the event. Next, whatever kind of visual impression you want, it is important that all the equipment, for anything from sound to cooking, functions well. Check out personally everything you want to rent.

David Silverman of D & D Rentals (555-5555) advises: "Look for an agency that offers everything." This makes it easier for you to organize the event and maintain control over things like color coordination, and it leaves you more time to enjoy your simchah. A good agency keeps a large inventory and if they don't have something you want, they know where to find it by networking with colleagues.

There are plenty of agencies, Silverman observes, and while they compete vigorously enough to keep prices reasonable, they also find it in their interest to network. One of his clients, for example, liked the window decorations he had seen at a party; but they were supplied by a niche company which only does window decorations, so it was in Silverman's interest able to give the niche company some business.

Spell out your needs in detail and discuss the logistics of the party with the rental agency. A good agency does not just supply objects, it also handles logistics and timing. Now there are virtual reality simulations which make it almost literally possible to "walk through" the party setting, to get a feel for spacing, access and movement at the different stages of the party.

In addition, make sure that the agency works well with other professionals at your party, like florists or caterers. If your event is outside the home, you will want an agency that has some experience working with halls or hotels. Versatility is yet another factor. For example, does a rental service offer children's furniture? Now that summer is here, can it deal with outdoor events?

More and more people are using rental agencies for their simchahs; Silverman sees this as a lasting trend. The larger the event, the farther in advance you should book, he advises. It is best to to so as soon as you know the date of your party.

Make it a kosher event

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Whatever type of party you are making, elegant kosher banquet halls abound in Toronto, with facilities to please even the most discriminating tastes.

For a summer event, Baycrest Hospitality Services (785-2500) offers guests the luxury of stepping outside from the dining-room into an outdoor setting among landscaped lawns and full grown trees. Guests at an intimate winter luncheon can dine near a roaring fireplace.

"No matter what season or occasion, Baycrest has the facilities and expert advice to make every event a memorable one," says Sharon Bizouati, manager of hospitality services.

Bizouati says that since Baycrest Hospitality Services was launched at Baycrest Centre in 1993, "its facilities, kosher kitchen and landscaped grounds have been perfect for small intimate gatherings or sophisticated affairs. We have been serving the catering needs of our community for many years and people can rely on us for quality service. Creating an event they will be proud of is our specialty."

Together with Lorraine Sherkin, functions coordinator, Bizouati brings a wealth of expertise to every function. "In-house caterers offer a wide variety of dishes and with the number of rooms available, parties of any size are beautifully accommodated. All rooms are air-conditioned and equipped for audio visual services and there is also space for exhibits and demonstrations in lobby areas.

For over 10 years, the Sheraton Centre Hotel (361-1000) has combined simplicity and elegance to assure complete success of every kosher function.

"Its ideal downtown location is situated right on the subway line for easy access and it is also connected to the City Hall underground parking, providing parking facilities for over 2,000 cars," says Carin Robertson, director of catering sales.

The 1,382-room hotel, says Robertson, is a perfect venue for meetings, social events and galas. "Basically, we have outstanding service and quality of food and a team of professionals who are dedicated to ensuring the success of the event. Being in a hotel, is particularly appealing to those with out-of-town guests. They merely need to step out of their hotel room to get to the party.

"Executive chef Heinz Wagner, offers a great amount of flexibility when it comes to menu planning and the menu includes a variety of fare to please everyone. Hosts can choose from cocktail parties, a pasta bar, specialty buffets, sit- down dinners or luncheons. Our only restrictions are the dietary laws," says Robertson.

Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue's (787-1631) newly refurbished social hall is ready for any type of party. Synagogue member Mary Pollak, an interior designer who volunteered her services to design the hall, says that the room is now brighter, airier and more elegant.

"From the newly tiled ceiling hang two Williamsburg chandeliers and the room is a lighter color so it appears more spacious. We also opened up two previously walled-in windows and added new mouldings around the room to add a special elegance. We are ready for affairs of up to 300 people," Pollak says.

Videos are now commonplace

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Over the past 10 years, party videos have gone from novelty to commonplace. As clients grow more aware and more demanding, they want to know more about the equipment, the quality of sound and film – and the videographer. What are some factors to consider in choosing a videographer for your event?

Pick a professional, advises Paul Laszlo of Twins Photo & Video (905-660-7385). Check his work; remember that his equipment and knowledge are more likely to be up-to-date if he is a full-time professional.

As special effects have become more common, says Peter Jestadt of Peter Jestadt Video Productions (416-488-8925), their novelty is wearing off. More and more clients want a video that documents their special event in a way that makes it memorable for its own sake.

The major factor, says Jestadt, is the personal touch. Laszlo and Jestadt agree that the videographer must be unobtrusive, yet well organized and at hand when needed. He is like the good waiter, who never intrudes on your dinner conversation, yet always knows when to refill a glass or top off your coffee.

Make sure the videographer is up to date in his field; check his mike and camera quality. Is he using a three-chip camera, for example, which makes for better definition, color and sound? You do not have to be a technical expert, Laszlo emphasizes, in order to judge results.

Peter Jestadt

Technology, Jestadt points out, now allows good videography without glaring lights. Good lighting makes the guests feel more comfortable; it also makes for a better looking video, with a visual atmosphere in keeping with the event. On the same theme, technology also allows the videographer to dispense with long, tangly cords, using batteries instead.

Good video work allows no mass production. The good videographer, says Jestadt, loves his work, and "gets it right." He listens closely to the client and treats not just each client, but also each event as unique. You are more likely to get this personal touch, he adds, with a smaller operation, where you deal directly with the person who videotapes and edits. The videographer himself should be at your event, even if he brings an assistant.

At the same time, Laszlo observes, the client should listen to the videographer too. Ultimately, the client is in charge; but professional input can only be to the good.

Book your videographer as soon as you know the date of your simchah, advise both Laszlo and Jestadt. Two years ahead is not too early, asserts Laszlo – especially if you want the head of the company rather than an assistant. Allow time to compare two or three videographers, he suggests, adding that comparison shopping and early booking can help cut costs.

Also, Jestadt adds, ascertain when the tape will be ready. If your videographer is conscientious, it should be complete in two to three weeks.

Bands should be versatile

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In choosing the band for your simchah, there is more to consider than the obvious essentials – good music and vocals.

Mila Kanev of the Mila Kanev Band (416-665-2450), and Paul Zurin of the Paul Zurin Orchestra (905-770-3084), agree that along with artistry, there must be audience rapport, and that a band has to treat each event as unique.

At events like weddings, says Kanev, a band should offer a repertoire of songs from several decades, to appeal to three or four generations. Audiences with several age groups are tougher, Zurin agrees, but pleasing them is a touchstone for a good band.

As people grow more aware of their heritage, a repertoire in more than one language also helps. You don't have to speak Yiddish to enjoy the music of the language. A wide repertoire makes it easier to honor requests – and keeps the band sounding fresh.

As no two hosts' wishes are alike, says Kanev, versatility is vital. This even includes the length of sets and breaks, which should be tailored to the occasion. Also, as the mood changes, the band should be able to ad lib or switch its mood at a moment's notice – which, Zurin adds, lets the band have more fun as well.

Kanev also observes that if the band feels at ease in a variety of environments, it transmits that feeling to the guests. Rapport with the guests, which almost requires antennae, is as important as working well with you, the host, who, after all, will enjoy the party more if your guests are having fun.

Kanev offers some tactical tips based on common sense and experience. Seat younger people, who usually like more volume, closer to the speakers, and older people farther away. Sometimes, music should stay in the background; and volume should never be overbearing, especially at dinner.

When it's time to dance, the band's role is more interactive, and even more so at request or sing-along time. The band may also help involve guests in games or contests, with announcements being made by the leader, fanfares before announcements and the like.

To gauge talent, referrals are only the beginning. You also need to hear the band live and see them in varying situations. Kanev points out that videocassettes from simchahs a band has played tell a lot about their rapport with other hosts and guests. Zurin recommends that the videos be unedited.

A good band sounds fresh and spontaneous, but that feeling is the result of hard work. The band leader, moreover, is only as good as those who work for him/her; so look for a band with a solid core group who work well together (and of course, with other professionals like videographers).

The number of musicians can be adjusted to your taste and budget – bearing in mind that with synthesizers, an eight-piece band can have the full sound of an orchestra, and that a bigger crowd wants a bigger sound.

Flowers turn mundane into festive

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Florist Gordon Dick of Van Bassen Florists (222-6751) cannot think of a more elegant way to decorate a room than with flowers and greenery.

"Take an empty room, add some flowers and instantly it is transformed into a festive hall that suits the mood of any party, whether it be formal or casual — whatever is on the agenda," he says.

Budget need not be a concern, he stresses, because lower cost flowers can brighten up a room as beautifully as their exotic counterparts. "Customers have the option of a number of inexpensive flowers such as carnations, freesia and irises, all in a rainbow of colors. Even using greens and one or two flowers as a table centrepiece can do a lot for a room.

"Those with a taste and the budget for something more exotic can choose sunflowers, calalilies, antherium, birds of paradise, halaconia, portea or ginger from such places as Hawaii, South America, Holland, New Zealand, Australia, Italy — anywhere in the world. Trained professionals can create arrangements for every occasion and from every type of flower."

An infinite variety of flowers

Most brides choose flowers to enhance their color scheme and with an infinite variety of flowers from which to pick, both domestic and imported, there are always blooms available to blend with the decor.

"White flowers add elegance to a black and white wedding and pink or off-white flowers blend in with a purple color scheme. Boutonnieres or corsages made of roses or orchids are a must for every attendant at a wedding and again, the color of the bloom blends with the rest of the room. If members of the bridal party want to keep their corsages as a memory of the occasion they can, with the proper instruction, have them preserved."

Dick urges hosts to select a florist that is longstanding in the community and one "with an excellent reputation. If you are unsure of what you want, go out and see some of the florist's work. Nothing creates ideas better than seeing what other people have done. Even browsing through a florist shop is enough to inspire a lot of people.

"Whatever florist you choose, make sure they have been properly trained. In our shop, all designers are trained in college or university in every aspect of the business. A professional florist can help even the novice create a beautiful party."

Long gowns are back in style

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

You twist and you turn and then it all comes back again, says fashion designer Anna Maria Ruberto (416-658-3500) about this year's return to long, elegant, formal gowns.

"We're going to see ankle-length sleeveless dresses draped with lightly beaded or laced chiffon that are complemented by gloves. Short dresses seem to be out of the question this year. Mothers of the bride, mothers of the groom, bridesmaids, even the guests are wearing gowns that are long and sedate."

Ruberto, who specializes in custom design, does work with silks, but only recommends the high-priced elegant fabric for guests or mothers of the bride, because "material that is that pricey does not come in bulk. For bridemaids, we could use Lanaset soiree, a blend between wool and triacetate which can be carried through every season and is not too stiff or too soft.

"We also concentrate on designing dresses that can be worn again, because we all want our dresses to go a long way. We cannot afford to buy a dress for just one occasion. Again, these gowns are formal and traditional — often empire cuts — so we complement the bodice with lace or beading. A little bit of glitz is in, but nothing too busy."

A mother of the bride or groom may want to go with the beaded silk, says Ruberto. "She can choose a simple sleeveless ankle-length dress topped by a lightly beaded mandarin collar and paired with a swinging coat that is trimmed to match the dress. During the ceremony, she wears the coat and then takes it off for the evening party — its stunning."

Ruberto cannot stress enough what a little bit of detail can do to a dress. "Take a simple dress, add some lace or some beading or even some elegant buttons and suddenly you've got an entirely new dress. Dresses already in your closet can often be spruced up. That is a great tip for a woman who needs something new but just cannot find room in her budget."

Mina Pizzitelli, owner of Mina Haute Couture (416-787-7133), designers of high fashioned ladieswear, says that lightly beaded or laced dresses made of taffeta or satin are important for the fall party season.

"Baby colors are coming back — pink, blues, greens and a lot of irredescents which pick up different shades. We seem to have gone away from simplicity and turned towards fancier gowns in more ornate fabrics often accented in gold and silver.

"A bride usually picks the color of the attendants' dresses to blend or coordinate with her own color scheme. Lines are straight with a slight flare and are mostly long — sometimes under-the-knee or mid-calf. Bridal attendants, however, are definitely wearing long gowns."

She says mothers of the bride wear slightly lower-keyed dresses than mothers of the bar or bat mitzvah, because "a bar or bat mitzvah mom is the hostess and should be the centre of attention. That calls for a dramatic, more fun dress. The mother of the bride, however, should not be competing with the bride or the groom's mother for attention."

Ruberto advises clients to try and come in at least five or six months before the big day in order to allow time to find the exact fabric they want.

"Clients can come in with a sketch or picture, but if they have no idea what they would like, we become fashion consultants. We play around with fabrics, designs and colors until we come up with something."

Pizzitelli has a lot of magazines and brochures to browse through for those still unsure of what they're after. "They might have to work within a color scheme, so we start from there. Otherwise, we drape them with fabric to see what works on them. Women can usually tell right away the fabric, color and style that suits them. We often just assure them they've made the proper choice."

PARTY PLANNER

All-occasion party planners

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Nik Manojlovich (left) and Michael Rosen.

An all-occasions party planning partnership, Plan-it Meeting and Special Occasions Planners, has been established by two veterans in the planning, food and catering industries.

Michael Rosen, who worked at the Sheraton Hotel and Park Plaza, teamed up with Nik Manojlovich whom he had worked with for more than eight years in the hotel business. They have had many years of diversified experience — as waiters, cooks, restaurant managers, food and beverage managers, catering managers and directors of catering with experience in kosher catering.

Weddings, bar or bat mitzvahs, openings, they've done them all.

"Our value-driven enthusiasm and the importance of our clients having fun while planning a special occasion are what breaks the traditional mould of a party or bridal consultant," Rosen said.

The company plans and consults on all aspects of an event, large or small, social or corporate, the partners said.

At a free consultation, they determine the needs, objectives and expectations of the event, and Rosen and Manojlovich can undertake part or all of the arrangements. Fees are on a sliding scale, based on needs and budget.

Their enthusiasm is infectious. "If something seems monumental, we can make it simple. We are there and can look after everything — from the ridiculous to the sublime. And we customize our services to everyone's tastes," Rosen said, adding that they have been able to save their clients money "because we know what the costs should be.

"We've nailed a heel on the shoe of the best man moments before the ceremony, we've climbed trees to nail barriers, we've cleared driveways of leaves and twigs and we've sent out unusual gift baskets to out of town guests at a simchah."

Because they are aware of religious practices and traditions, Rosen said, they can help the families in these areas as well.

"The many recommendations and letters we receive are a testament to the level of service we deliver," Manojlovich said.

Deena Sigal, whose daughter's marriage was held at the family's country summer home, where many additional items had to be considered for a kosher wedding, said, "All of Plan-it's extra efforts certainly paid off. Everything came together perfectly and everyone agreed that it was indeed a very special day."

"We are both overachievers," Rosen said. "We had immediate mutual respect and we love working together. If we have fun, everyone has fun."

They have worked on numerous fundraising events, including the Mount Sinai Ball, Baycrest's gala events, and the AIDS VIP tent hosted by Mayor Barbara Hall.

Good disc jockeys both entertain and organize

BY ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Tal Meissner of Urban Groove Productions (416-781-7064) and Jamie Starkman of Incredible Party Productions (416-590-9878) are alike in their commitment to quality entertainment.

Yet, each has a unique, unduplicated approach to his work and to what to think about when choosing your DJ.

A good DJ will both entertain and organize. He likes people, he works well with bands and other professionals at a simchah, and networks with others on the entertainment circuit.

Youthfulness, up-to-dateness and ability to innovate count for a lot, but so does experience.

People want something original, spontaneous and creative. They want a memorable event that will call to mind a special feeling years later.

Minor as the expense of hiring a disc jockey may be, the man or woman up there with the tape deck is often the focal point of the party.

Guests no longer tolerate somebody who just plays cassettes and speaks to the audience every 20 minutes, says Meissner. They want to sense that he's having as much fun as they are. A good DJ not only plays the requests and entertains the guests, adds Starkman, he helps them entertain each other.

Meissner, who works a lot at events like school dances and bar mitzvahs, emphasizes projecting the right mix of energy and relaxation, but also picking up on kids' "vibes," which are often easier to read than adults'.

A good entertainer responds to kids' rapid shifts in feeling and their inexhaustible energy, and directs it to positive fun. He channels and controls it, without being a drill sergeant.

Everyone should have a good time

Also, Meissner points out, a bar or bat mitzvah is not just for the children nor is a wedding just for the adults.

Make sure your DJ knows what kinds of guests are coming. "Simchah" means "rejoicing," everyone should have a good time. This includes those who don't try to be the "life of the party," but get much of their joy watching others enjoy themselves.

Interaction is big nowadays, and that's good, says Starkman, but let it be tailored to the simchah. Look at the differences between, say, a wedding and a bar mitzvah, then add the fact that no two weddings are exactly alike either.

Starkman advises hiring a company that keeps its client base low. Competitive as this business is, it's one where you grow, not by turnover, but by service and reputation.

The best DJs, he says, "treat you like a person, not a file number." This means constant open communication between client and disc jockey. If someone other than the head of the company is going to entertain at your party, get to know him or her too.

Don't go for a flat rate or package. Instead, look for a low minimal rate and find out the cost of each item added on. Book your DJ at least four months ahead, urges Starkman, the bigger the event, the farther in advance.

Meissner says six months. Smaller operations are more personal, but can offer the best service if you engage them early. If it's the first big event you've organized or your first with a particular DJ, plenty of lead time is even more essential.

Gift registries are a favor to both guests and brides

BY ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Both Ilene Bronsteter of Bronson's China & Gifts (905-881-9930) and Suzanne Savage of The Bay (416-861-6080) see the main advantage of a registry in reducing gift duplication and ensuring that the bride gets what she wants.

(Now with men more involved in the household, it is more accurate to say "bride and groom." Most couples register in both their names.)

In making sure a gift will be wanted, both women agree that registering is as much a favor to the guests as to the bride and her family. It eliminates the agony of second-guessing other people's tastes. It ensures that newlyweds get complete sets, yet it also benefits the buyer on a modest budget, who can afford only part of a dining service.

Savage says that registering takes some of the burden of communicating with the guests off the bride's family, shifting it to the store.

Today, says Bronsteter, there are two types of brides: one who is setting up on her own for the first time and needs everything; and one who has been on her own for some time and wants to avoid duplication of what she already has.

In either case, the presents given at showers, engagement parties or bridal luncheons are going to be used to set up a household.

Therefore, before coming in to register, think carefully about what you want and what your guests can afford. Why register for place settings at $300 each, if no one will buy them? Also, register several weeks before any event like a shower and give yourself time to choose.

In choosing a store to register with, says Bronsteter, consider what kinds of service it offers. They should take an interest in you as a person. Also, they will keep track of what you have registered for and know who has bought what at a given time.

Will you be sure that when you need six place settings, you don't get eight?

When you first come to register, the range of choice may bewilder you, You may want to make more than one visit, to sort out in your mind what's available. Once you grow used to looking, you will probably become more selective and more relaxed. When registering, you should enjoy yourself and feel comfortable with your choices.

Look carefully at what's on the market, says Savage. Most registries are for highly personalized items, like linens, dishes, giftware and silver, though the range has recently broadened to include items like garden tools.

These are important items that you will be seeing every day of your life, be sure to pick exactly what you want.

Finally, set your priorities and make your list carefully. If it's too long, you won't get complete sets. If there are too few items on it, guests will run out of things to buy. Make sure you can change or add to your list and insist on personal service.

A kiddie invasion

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

If the thought of 20 youngsters invading your home for a birthday party makes you want to run the other way, you might want to consider having your next party at an indoor play centre.

At the Fun 'N More Party Centre inside the Promenade Mall (905-764-8955), there are three party rooms full of activities including arts and crafts, video and audio equipment and a playground featuring balls, climbers and slides. As well, there are a large number of toys — trucks, a play kitchen and play house, puzzles, wagons and books.

The computer room for kids between the ages of 5 and 10 include Super Nintendo, Sega Genesis, Sega Saturn, Sony-Playstation and a variety of educational software, while at the arts and crafts centre geared for children of all ages, guests can partake in painting models or puppet making.

"I always stress that we designed the playroom with safety in mind; so parents never need worry about their children. There are no sharp corners and there are mats covering the floor. Children really cannot get hurt."

Party packages include optional food (kosher is available), invitations, popcorn, coffee for the parents and a host to set up and clean up. Parents can choose a private or semi-private party.

Pre-teens are not left out at Fun 'N More and when daylight fades, the play centre changes its name to The Diamond, is emptied of toys and invaded by partiers who dance along with disc jockeys Freedom of Sound.

"We change the name, because kids that age do not want to come to a party at a play centre. We hold weekly evening dances and as well, the room can be booked for a private party.

At Rainbow Playland (905-886-0306), which opened just over two months ago, kids age 1 to 7 have a ball on its climbing structures or in the puppet and movie theatre, the arts and crafts room and toddler area, which includes a ball pit and climbing mountain.

David Sadja, owner of Rainbow Play Systems, manufacturer of residential play systems, said that when he discovered the Richmond Hill location at 30 Fulton Way, Units 5 and 6, he decided it would be perfect as a party centre.

"Parents book the entire room and the 1½-hour party includes paper products, invitations, two jugs of juice and popcorn. Catering is done through the centre and kosher food is available. If desired, parents can hire a private hostess."

Consultants are party saviors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Who is there, on the spot, to mend a bride's ripped wedding gown, administer smelling salts to a faint groom, or convince 30 people that they cannot all sit at the same table even though it says so on their seating card?

"Who else but the party consultant?" says Judy Stein (905-764-7604). "And I've had all those things happen to me. With a little bit of calm, a lot of experience and my Mary Poppins bag full of remedies, however, all the situations were rectified and everything went on smoothly."

Stein compares hiring a party consultant to buying insurance. "Sometimes you need it more than others. They are there, though, through every aspect of the party from the initial planning to the end of the big event, and most people could use a little bit of help, even if there are no minor emergencies."

She says that when clients hire her, she works with them hand in hand, from hiring the professionals to buying the dress to picking the invitations.

"I will accompany them, if they want, or else I can lead them in the right direction. If women want their dress made, I can recommend a dressmaker, or else I can tell them about some wholesale stores. I charge one flat fee and I can get involved as little or as much as my clients wish."

In the business for about 17 years, Stein says that a lot of her experience comes from watching other consultants work.

"After people began asking my advice about their parties, I decided that this was the work for me, and I love it."

On a wedding day, she arrives when the bride gets dressed and remains until the bride throws the bouquet.

"I come with my bag packed with a needle and thread, makeup, makeup remover, headache pills, smelling salts, panty hose — any number of things — and I've used everything one time or another."

Although she cannot bring it in her bag, diplomacy plays a large part in a consultant's job. "When the 30 people all got a card that said they were seated at one particular table, it happened to be one of the best tables, so everyone wanted to sit there. It took a lot of tactful maneuvering to get some of them to sit somewhere else. That is when the hosts knew they had done the right thing by hiring a consultant.

Legends come to life

You're entertaining a bridal party or out-of-town guests, or you want to give someone a special birthday evening. Why not take them to see Buddy Holly or Elvis Presley. They're alive and well at Legends Dinner Theatre at the Ramada Hotel/Don Valley (416-490-7665).

Open Thursday through Saturday evenings, the show features not only Buddy Holly and Elvis, but Tom Jones, Tina Turner, Elton John, The Blues Brothers, Cher and any number of up-beat performers portraying superstars. Not only do they strut their stuff, they often bring up audience members to strut with them. What could be better than dancing with Elvis?

At a recent week-end show featuring such greats as The Blues Brothers, Tina Turner and Buddy Holly, audience members were astonished at the performers' likeness to their superstar counterparts. From Cher's curly, long mop and risque outfit to Buddy Holly's glasses and bow tie to Tom Jones' girating hips, the audience was treated to a evening of their favorite music and their favorite stars.

"Imagine spending my last night as a single woman with Tom Jones," sighed one bride to other members of her bachelorette party.

What really makes the show is that the audience realizes the performers not only look like the stars, they sound just like them. When Kenny Rogers, Dolly Parton, The Beatles or Nat King Cole get up on the stage, they use their own voices and play their own instruments — no lip synching at all.

The Legends in Concert show has been staged worldwide and has permanent homes in Las Vegas, Myrtle Beach, Hawaii, Atlantic City, Miami — and in Toronto since March. It travels twice yearly to Australia and has appeared in South America, China, Japan and the Soviet Union. Locations are planned this year in Paris and London.

The evening does not have to end when the two-hour show is over. Your guests can mingle with the stars and dance until they drop.

Centrepieces can be fun and decorative

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Renee Birenbaum, who co-owns Mandell Entertainment Decor (905-886-4000) with Corey Mandell, stumbled into the party decoration business six years ago.

Birenbaum had been painting gift baskets and sweatshirts. One of her customers asked her to make centre-pieces for a bar mitzvah. That led to eight party bookings and was the beginning of her new career in party planning and decor.

She worked out of her home for three years, but was outgrowing that space. At the same time, Mandell was looking to start a decorating division to complement his music/DJ business. The two decided to team up, forming a partnership — the decorating division of Mandell Entertainment Group (27 West Beaver Creek).

"It was a very good match," Birenbaum says. "People need decor and they need music. Now they are able to find it all under one roof. It saves the client a lot of time and effort."

Many people in the party business have been copying the style of centre-pieces Birenbaum originated and she strives to stay a step ahead of the competition by coming up with original centre-piece concepts and designs, she says. "We're trying to come out with a more unique look."

She has an artist who does airbrushing, and the actual pieces are lit up on a special rental unit, she says. For one bar mitzvah with a racing theme, each centre-piece was a different style of race car; each had a three-dimensional look as a result of the airbrushing techniques and special lighting.

Birenbaum stresses that Mandell Entertainment can provide decor to suit a variety of budgets. It offers free consulting and sample centre-pieces are provided at no charge.

Mandell Entertainment can provide everything from props like popcorn and cotton candy makers to balloons, centre-pieces, flowers throw-aways and give-aways and other novelty items. Birenbaum is also doing a lot more floral work, combining the floral arrangements with centre-piece themes.

A headtable at a simchah and (below)a kids' table decorated by Renee Birenbaum.

She says the company has branched out into doing complete party decor, which includes coordinating table cloths and chair covers, for both bar mitzvahs and weddings. In fact, Mandell Entertainment Decor will help plan the party "every step of the way," she says. "We help them [clients] feel more relaxed."

People wanting unusual floral centre-pieces may want to visit one of Kay N Young flower shops.

There two locations: the original store (416-922-5651) at 136 Avenue Rd. near the corner of Davenport Road, and the newer Thornhill store (905-761-1915) at 7000 Bathurst St. at Bathurst and Steeles.

Kay N Young is known for its exotic flowers and reasonable prices, owner Annette Fung says. "We sell flowers retail. We have the best prices in town." The flowers come from all over the world, she adds.

Fung began doing floral centre-pieces 10 years ago. Now she's doing at least one wedding a week. Customers like her selection of high quality exotic flowers like Casablancas (large white lilies), ginger lilies and haliconias.

The centre-pieces start at $25. Two-tier floral arrangements are popular for large affairs, with roses and lilies the flowers most in demand, Fung notes. The arrangements are coordinated with the color and theme of the affair. All white or very bright pallettes are the current trend, she says.

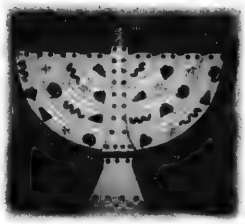
Great gifts await you

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN



Thrillz, (416-781-7313) a ceramics studio cum gift shop co-owned by three sisters, grew out of a hobby.

Lori Rosenthal, Lisa and Lesley Matthews had taken a ceramics course together three years ago.

Then the women began selling their work and exhibiting in craft shows. Production took place in Lisa's basement with the showroom in Lori's home. But with the growth of the business, they had to move Thrillz to a commercial location.

Today it is located on the second floor of the Lawrence Plaza at 534 Lawrence Ave. W., Suite 212.

Thrillz is known for its brightly colored ceramics, and custom and personalized work, says Lesley. Come in with a photograph and Thrillz can create a platter with a full family portrait, she says.

Any size ceramic piece, from mugs and picture frames to platters, can be personalized and it can be done while the customer waits, she says. "I can make the back of the gift the card."

Personalized gifts are common for birthdays and anniversaries, and for the bride and groom to give to their wedding parties. Thrillz also offers a registry service for those brides who want hand-painted dishes in some of the patterns offered. Colors and designs can also be altered to suit individual tastes.

Thrillz also has a large selection of Judaica — menorahs, kiddish cups, Pesach plates and Shabbat candlesticks. Its merchandise is also available at two local gift stores — Bronson's and Millie & Lenny on Avenue Road and Bronson's at Steeles and Yonge. Gifts can also be purchased at the studio in Lawrence Plaza, but appointments are necessary.

People wanting to give original art as a gift may want to visit Affairs of the Art, a gallery and frame shop (905-886-6349) at 100 Steeles Ave. W.

The gallery offers a wide selection of framed original art, original serigraphs and etchings and limited edition prints and posters. Also available are papier mache sculptures by Judith Lear, who was recently commissioned to do sculptures by McDonald's and the city of Richmond Hill.

Gallery owner Brian Liss, an art consultant and agent, represents several Canadian artists including Jason Alexander, whose works can be found at Affairs of the Art as well as in 30 galleries across North America, and Leventhal, the artist who is giving the Second Cup Cafes their new look.

A quality piece of art is an excellent gift for weddings and special anniversaries, Liss says. "We have all price ranges from $50 and up." He also offers an exchange policy and gift certificates.

Affairs of the Art has many items for house-warming and wedding gifts like framed mirrors and the papier mache sculptures. It also carries a lot of sports art like autographed jerseys and posters of the Maple Leaf and Blue Jays for bar mitzvah gifts, he says.

Liss also does art consulting and custom framing for residential and commercial spaces. He chooses art for private homes and corporate headquarters like the new Mattel Canada head office in Mississauga. He takes care of the installation.

In August, Affairs of the Art will have a new home. It's moving to 978 Eglinton Ave., in the Bathurst-Eglinton area.

Photos last a lifetime

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Sam Sciarrino of Horvath Photography (416-487-3443) and Joe Lavee of Lavee Studios (416-733-2457) do not differ on the advice they would offer someone deciding how to choose a photographer.

Start out by following your instinct: Do you like his work? Then comes a harder question: Do you have rapport? No matter how great someone's artistic talent, personality is important if you are to work well together. While you want someone who takes pride in his work and maintains high standards, you also want someone who will listen to you, the client.

What's right for someone else, Sciarrino points out, may not be right for you. Like photographers themselves, you have your style preferences, causal or artistic, formal or informal, hard-edged or soft-edged, and while a referral may point you in the right direction, you ultimately have to see for yourself.

Lavee advises you to be sure that at your simchah, you will get what you see in the studio, not something by someone else, whose work you don't know. Try to get your work done by the studio owner or one of his key people whose work you can see in advance.

Insist that the photographer give your work the time it deserves. No matter how good he is at his best, be sure that when he comes to your event, he won't be distracted by over-booking and have to rush off in an hour.

If he's booked in full, a photographer more interested in professional integrity and good name than in short-term gain, may refer you to a colleague. If he's only booking one job a day, Sciarrino says it's a good sign since he's allowing himself time to do good work.

First impressions are a start, but they're not everything. You like someone's style today, how will you feel in 10 years? A photograph should capture the feelings of a moment at your special event, so that you can relive them years or decades later.

Look for work which calls attention to its subject, not to photographic cleverness. Like extra spice dumped into a pot of food, special effects often merely distract from lack of quality.

Also, find out who will be doing the different kinds of shots. One photographer may be good at portraits, for example, but not candid shots, as they are quite different. A portrait captures the lasting essence of a person, as expressed in a face; a candid shot captures an endearing, charming or amusing moment which comes and goes so fast it would otherwise be lost.

Most studios, Sciarrino says, are state-of-the-art and don't cut corners, but expect to pay for quality and be a bit suspicious of prices too far below average. Book as soon as you know the date of your simchah – especially if you want a particular person to take your photos.

Good photographers are much in demand and may be booked in full over a year in advance.

Travel agents offer best deals

BY ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In talking about how to choose a travel agent, both Ehud Telem of Payless Travel (905-886-5610) and Avi Rodak of Aufgang Travel (416-789-7117) say that no two agents are alike. At the same time, both stress the importance of integrity in dealing with clients.

Rodak advises choosing a travel agent the same way you would choose any professional.

He also sees one advantage of an agent in the fact that he has some emotional distance from the choice of travel options. He wants you to be satisfied, but he himself is not actually going to make the trip, so it's easier for him to be objective about it.

Look for a reputable, full-time agent, advise both men. This person gives your needs full attention, even for short routine trips. With deregulation and new markets opening, changes are coming so fast you have to be a professional to keep up.

Airlines reserve the right to change rules without notice, so only a professional is likely to know what the changes are.

A good agent tries to save you money and find the best deal, but also offers options. A travel agent doesn't need to get a licence, but Rodak and Telem agree he does need to get experience, develop rapport with clients, treat them as individuals and build up trust.

If a deal looks too good, be careful, says Telem. Both men recommend that you shop around before choosing.

Face to face

Rodak says that before committing yourself, you should meet your prospective agent face to face. While seeing someone in person doesn't guarantee anything, it may give you the extra reassurance you need in evaluating someone.

There are some bad people in the business, Rodak concedes, but it doesn't make sense to buy tickets direct from the airline and avoid all agents, just because of one or a few.

Moreover, if you call the airline, they will try to sell you their product, whereas the travel agent, with you as his client, will try to find you the best product.

Some agents are good for vacation travel, some for corporate, others do both. Most agencies now have some specialty, whether in destinations (i.e. London) or in clients (i.e. seniors). Incentive travel, where companies offer trips as a reward for productivity, is now a specialty in its own right.

A good agent, besides being an information source, takes the trouble to know you and your travel needs and to "click" with you.

If he has some hands-on travel experience, Rodak says, he adds something intangible to the schedules and lists he calls up on his computer, because he has a feeling for what options will satisfy you.

Check out that your agent has insurance, advises Telem. Plan to stay over Saturday night if you can, he says, it cuts flight costs by as much as half or more, making you a "vacationer" instead of a "business traveller." And of course,with airlines continually changing fares and routes, book as far ahead as possible.

Hairstyles reflect mood

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

For a bride, choosing the right hair style is as important as choosing the most becoming gown.

Hairdresser John Di Bratto (416-222-hair, 222-4247) specializes in weddings, working with brides and other wedding party members on the day of the big event.

"It's such an exciting day, so highly charged," Di Bratto said. "I enjoy working on location with the photographers and makeup artists."

Di Bratto, a hair stylist and color technician, does about 35 weddings a year, he said. "I get calls from all over Ontario and next summer I'm doing a wedding in Greece."

His services are also in demand by the wedding industry. He creates hair styles for wedding trade shows in Toronto in February and September.

Hair has to reflect the mood of the dress, he said. He usually consults with a bride ahead of time, trying a variety of styles with a head piece "to create a look that's her own."

Brides also bring pictures of their dresses, seeking his advice on headpieces, he said. Today, "veils are smaller and set at the back of the head instead of on top of the crown."

He recommends a classic look with a modern touch, because the style "has to ensure the test of time in the wedding photos."

The most popular style is an updo, Di Bratto noted, but "a special style even down can be beautiful."

In some cases, he adds silk flowers — fresh flowers wilt and discolor — and jewelry for a special touch; he also uses jewelled hair pins for up-dos, he said.

The general trend is for brides to have natural looking color, according to Di Bratto. Brides prefer something as close to their natural color as possible with soft rather than bold highlights, he said.

But those looking for bold color may be interested in some of the current hair trends. "This is the biggest year for color," said color technician Nitza Mangos of Desmos (416-482-4100), "There are new dramatic colors that can't be done at home, [such as] dark burgundy hair with cherry highlights 1½ inches wide."

Another look is created through the use of two new colors. The whole head is dark bronze, with the front hairline died platinum blond, Mangos said.

Multicolors like golden blonds, copper, cherry red all on one head are also being shown; cool ice, a shade close to platinum blond is "all the rage," she added.

Permed hair is not as popular this year because it doesn't go well with the dramatic colors, Mangos said. "It's too much chemical treatment for the hair."

Desmos, a shop with marble, wrought iron and antique fixtures, is a new full service hair dressing salon located at 2063 Yonge St. (three blocks south of Eglinton). Owners Crissa Chilakos, Dia Psimouli and Niki Spano opened Desmos in December.

It's a ceramic painters feast at Maddie told Hattie

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Some 15 women sit around two long tables painting ceramic pieces and chatting. They're at a party at Maddie told Hattie on the Danny, organized by speech pathologist Joey Shlanger.

Maddie told Hattie (416-778-6469) at 1340 Danforth Ave., just east of the Greenwood subway is a studio gallery where people come to create their own hand-painted dishes, using only lead-free paints.

They choose from the wide variety of greenware stock priced under $10. The cost of $8 per studio hour in addition to the price of the greenware pieces includes four colors of paint or underglaze, as well as brushes, glazing, cleaning and two firings. Seniors and students pay $6 an hour; children under 13, $5.

Customers can drop in during the day to paint, but some evenings and afternoons are reserved for Clay Play parties. You bring your own food and spend time schmoozing and painting with friends.

Studio owner Debye Dorsey, a certified ceramic artist, describes the studio gallery as an "artists' colony for ordinary people," because, she says, "hand-painted ceramics is functional art."

Dorsey guides people as they go through the stages of choosing designing, painting and glazing their ceramic pieces.

"It's a do-it-yourself creative process," she says, and several of their clients drop in on a regular basis.

"But many of the people who come in here are first-timers," she adds. "We give demonstrations and detailed instructions and I advise them."

For parties of 10 or more, there are no restrictions on color selection. Adult rates run at $15 per person for 2½ hours; children's rates are $6 for 1½ hours. These prices do not include the greenware costs, but do cover the ceramic card signed by guests.

Once participants finish painting and glazing, Dorsey fires their creations in a kiln on the premises. The completed work can be picked up five to seven working days later.

The ceramic studio party is an ideal venue for a party Shlanger says. "It's my second time here. You get to have fun and you can be productive."

Her sister, advertising executive Patti Laine, works intently on a brightly colored floral platter. An avowed arts and crafts person, Laine highly recommends Maddie told Hattie.

"Dorsey has a really good selection of inventory and there's lots. So if your friend wants to do a teapot like yours, it's possible."

Indeed the five-tier shelving unit in the studio is filled with bisqued greenware — raw clay that has been fired — in every size and shape. The selection includes tiles, garlic holders, three styles of dinner plates, various sized bowls and platters, mugs, teapots, picture frames and salt shakers.

Dorsey says she prides herself on the variety of bisqued pieces, which also include Jewish ceremonial items like menorahs, kiddish cups and candle holders.

Teacher Cindy Zimmerman says the monogrammed plate she's painting is destined to become a family heirloom. "Once you zero in on the process it isn't difficult."

Newlywed Tanya Morita drops into the studio during the party to pick up pieces she made earlier at a wedding shower held for her at Maddie told Hattie.

"It was the best shower I ever went to and it was mine," she says.

A WhirlyBall of a time

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Entrepreneurs (from left) Stephen Steinhauer, Arthur Schwartz and Jack Frymer believe WhirlyBall is a fun game for kids of all ages. (Paul Lungen photo)

Kids do it. Adult businessmen do it. Even yeshivah students with tzizit do it.

What this motley assortment of fun lovers and thrill seekers love to do is play a brand new contact sport that has already taken several American cities by storm.

It's called WhirlyBall and it combines elements of basketball, hockey, lacrosse and polo. It's a game that can be enjoyed on your first attempt and it allows men and women, grandparents and grandchildren to play the game together on a level playing field.

Here's how it works: 10 participants, five on each side, strap themselves into specially constructed bumper cars and manoeuvre themselves in a squared circle that resembles a basketball court. But instead of gliding over hardwood, the vehicle rolls over a metal, electicity-conducting surface.

Participants use a plastic scooper to pick up a softball-sized whiffle ball, pass it among themselves, advance it down the court and shoot at a target about the size of a basketball backboard.

You get three points for hitting the centre of the target, one for hitting the backboard itself. Simple enough. Oh, and did I mention you can use your bumper cars to block opponents or, setting aside any tactical value, just give your foes a good ramming?

When played by experienced whirlers, the game is fast-paced and features continuous action, with bumping becoming a secondary aspect of the sport, said Stephen Steinhauer, one of four partners in the venture to bring WhirlyBall to Canada.

Together with Arthur Schwartz, Jack Frymer and Ark Tevlin, he has put his money where his enthusiasm is in the hope that WhirlyBall will duplicate its U.S. success north of the border.

The foursome believe there's huge growth potential for the game in the true north, frozen and free.

First-timers almost always come off the court with a big smile on their faces and it's really caught on in U.S. cities, they say.

Kids, needless to say, love it because it's a game and they're kids. Adults love it because it makes them feel like kids again.

It's perfect for high-pressure corporate types to blow off steam, and executives see WhirlyBall as a great way to allow staff to build camaraderie and team spirit, the partners said. Some companies bus in their staff for games, pitting departments against each other.

Interestingly, women really take to WhirlyBall because for many, it's their first exposure to a team sport and the camaraderie that comes with it.

In the few months it's been available in Toronto, a Tuesday night league has formed. On a more casual level, WhirlyBall is making inroads among the bar and bat mitzvah set.

In Detroit, one of a dozen U.S. cities with WhirlyBall, the WhirlyBall facility is located in West Bloomfield in the heart of the Jewish community. Almost half the Saturday nights during the year are rented for bar or bat mitzvah celebrations, Schwartz said.

In Toronto, Mandell Entertainment has agreed to provide DJ service, professional lighting and one or two dancers to keep the bar/bat mitzvah party going on either or both of the two WhirlyBall courts.

One Jewish day school has been negotiating to hold its graduation party there, while Frymer, Steinhauer and Schwartz believe there's also a market among the city's Orthodox.

In Cleveland, a group of rabbis are regulars, and in Toronto, the first person to visit the facility after the sign went up was an ex-yeshivah student from Cleveland, "who insisted on being the first customer," said Schwartz.

On chol hamo'ed Pesach, the place was packed from noon to midnight with yeshivah bochers wearing tzizit. "In Cleveland, it's their game," Schwartz said, adding that the phone starts ringing off the hook right after Shabbat.

"It's a very competitive game," said Schwartz. "It's a sport with a physical aspect of other sports, but without the danger."

"There's a special thing that happens when you play on a team," Steinhauer said. "You're high fiving ... there's a special magic."

Steinhauer "discovered" WhirlyBall in the early 1980s while attending law school at the University of Miami.

After moving back to Toronto, he played the game occasionally while on vacation and he noticed that women were enjoying the game as much as men.

In the late '80s, he decided to look into it as an investment. He interested his longtime friend, Schwartz, and later Frymer and Tevlin came on board. They figured it was an ideal activity for Canada's long winters.

Beautiful gown gives you over 15 minutes of fame

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

All eyes are riveted on the bride as she walks down the aisle.

It is, after all, her day. And it's the dress that helps her stand out as even more special.

Buying the bridal gown involves a major decision; so it's important to shop at a reputable salon.

Edith's (416-633-4222) at 245 Wilmington Ave. in North York is known for its large selection and excellent service, says owner Joe Nourani. He has three full-time seamstresses to customize wedding gowns from all over the world.

Edith's is also the only bridal shop with a milliner — hats can be made to match suits.

In addition, dresses can be altered and shoes can be dyed on the premises to match an outfit.

Edith's offers customers 8,000 square feet of retail space, providing everything the bride, mothers of the bride and groom, and bridesmaids will need.

Bridal gowns are priced between $600 and $5,000. Veils can be made on the premises or the bride can choose from an assortment of imported veils.

Gowns for flower-girls range from $170 to $250, while bridesmaids' dresses start at $150.

Bridal gowns made of high quality polyester can be more expensive than silk, Nourani said, and he often recommends the polyester, because it holds up better on the wedding day and is easier to care for and clean than silk.

Straight and period bridal gowns are currently less fashionable, while more traditional flared organza skirts puffed up with crinolines are very popular, he said. Many of the dresses come with detachable trains, so the gowns can be reused.

Nourani also has a large variety of dresses for mothers of bride and groom, he says. "In Canada, we are number one for mothers." He can special-order dresses or change fabrics to suit any mother, he said. "Every mother walks out of here happy."

Ritché (416-789-4378) at 1662 Avenue Rd., one of the best-known bridal-gown companies in Toronto, offers customers a huge selection from 30 bridal wear lines in additon to the Ritché line.

Jack Ritché, who started the company 44 years ago, runs it with his daughter and son-in-law Vivian and Arthur Prussky. A second location (416-504-2349) in the heart of the fashion district at 423 Richmond St. houses the clearance centre and factory where all the custom work is done.

Ritché is showing a lot of sleeve-less and halter-style dresses, with a '60s style crew neck and empire waist line with an A-line skirt, Vivian Prussky said. "It's very Jackie O, very sophisticated and very classy."

For the ceremony, most girls add a matching shawl that comes with the dress or one custom made by Ritché, she said.

Designers are showing fewer sequins and more pearls, with some bugle beads, Prussky said. "Brides are less afraid to show color, like adding gold beading."

Chiffon is popular, as is silk, which is more reasonably priced these days, she said. "It is possible to get a silk bridal gown for under $1,000." Supionne silk (raw silk), which is cream or off-white, is also becoming more common, she added.

Ritché's Avenue Road location carries a large selection of mothers' and bridesmaids' dresses and some daywear. It also carries a line of less formal gowns, which start at $375 for brides getting married at resorts in the Caribbean or for second weddings and luncheons, Prussky said.

She said the store has such a wide spectrum of wedding gowns that a bride should be able to find the right dress. Ritché also offers the convenience of one-stop shopping with bustiers, crinolines, veils, shoes and other bridal items available on the premises.

Prussky spoke enthusiastically about Meadows shoes, a new line of dyable silk shoes with leather soles imported from England. The shoes come in low, medium and high heels; there is also a silk boot embroidered with roses.

"Some of our original brides come in to buy dresses for their daughter's or granddaughter's weddings," Prussky said. They bring in their own wedding pictures from years ago to show Ritché. .

"We're seeing second and third generation of Ritché's original brides," she said.

Entertainment coordinating is a new field, but the name says it all. An entertainment coordinator coordinates all the entertainers at a party, bands, DJ's, comics, as members of a single show.

He also works with the other professionals at a party, like caterers, to make sure you and your guests enjoy the way the entertainment meshes with everything else.

How to choose a coordinator?

WEVA

Ed McMurtry of Edwin Allen Productions (905-737-8670) highlights the importance of finding someone who treats your simchah as unique, putting together a personalized show for you.

Most of the work must be done beforehand, so find someone with a talent for detail and logistics, who will devote time and care to your event. Even good entertainers' rapport with the guests depends largely on how they work together, this is the coordinator's job.

At any simchah, however well planned, something unpredictable happens, so look for someone who can improvise. Also, the coordinator should be interactive with you, the host, getting feedback in the planning stages and interactive with the guests when the big day comes, drawing them into the entertainment.

Good planning requires a core program, which is on no matter what, but there must be openings for repartee, even chances for the guests to upstage the entertainers.

Look for someone with experience, someone who knows that different guidelines work for different events. At a bar mitzvah, the entertainers can be informal with the kids, as long as they keep a lid on the rambunctiousness, whereas at a wedding, interaction with guests is more reserved and dignified.

Before you talk to an entertainment coordinator, work out what kind of ambience you want. Elegant, understated lighting goes with a wedding dance floor, bar mitzvah kids want disco blips. A good coordinator sees everything, from food to music, as part of one total show and takes care that no one steals anyone else's thunder.

A good coordinator has his staff dress well, even formally. Tuxedos and black ties impart dignity, even at an informal event and coordinators should work in front of their equipment. As much as any entertainer, they are on display.

To ensure that a guest is happy, an entertainment coordinator can find himself doing unexpected things, like finding a strayed child. This is another reason for ties and tuxedos, they show the wearer as someone in authority, who can help when called upon.

Equipment should be high-quality and need minimal attention. CDs are better than tapes, because a request song can be found in seconds. Then there's making optimum use of equipment. For ambient sound, if you have bass speakers on the floor, and medium and high speakers off the ground, you can have big sound without turning up the volume.

Be particular and thorough. The overall feeling must be perfect. Book your entertainment coordinator as soon as possible, McMurtry advises for weddings one year ahead, for bar mitzvahs two. There are only a few experienced people in the field and planning takes time.

Caterers can satisfy all tastes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The bride is a vegetarian, her mother is on a salt-free diet and the groom does not eat chicken. Can everyone at the wedding be satisfied?

"Absolutely," says Joe Elmaleh, owner of Tri-Elm Caterers (416-631-7322). "Caterers should be able to prepare as many specialty dishes as necessary. Even if the rest of the party is eating lemon chicken, that does not mean the few that don't eat it cannot be accommodated."

Elmaleh, who caters at B'nai Torah, the new Royalton Banquet and Convention Centre and the Borochov Centre, as well as at private parties, has prepared an entire vegetarian wedding that included such delicacies as mushroom-vegetable turnovers, hummus and creamy eggplant salads and stir-fried vegetables and rice. "No one could believe how satisfied they could be with a meal that contained no meat," he said.

He concedes that budget is a big concern when planning a simchah but assures clients that money can be saved in certain areas without sacrificing quality.

"Let us know what we're working with and we can always come up with a feasible plan. For starters, wedding parties cost 10 percent less if they're held on week-days and if we serve buffet style, clients also save money because we're saving on serving staff."

David Berk, of Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers (905-738-6880) caters at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and as off-premise caterer in association with GMB Culinary Productions at various other locations, agrees that a strict budget does not restrict the quality of a meal.

"We appreciate the importance of sticking to a budget and we are always ready to suggest ways to work around it. For instance a salmon fillet is a different cost base than pasta but what we can do is make a creative dish out of salmon and pasta.

"I also advise clients to watch the number of guests they are inviting. Bottom-line dollars are always less when there are less people. We encourage people to be mindful of their guest list."

How do you choose a meal that will satisfy all the guests? "What we try to do is satisfy the greatest common denominator," says Berk. "We do not go to one extreme or the other by being too exotic or too traditional. We get a feel for who is coming and try and come up with a meal that most people will like. There are always specialty meals for those who do not eat what we are serving.

"Buffets are a great way to please a large number of people. Not only is there a bigger variety of foods, it can be presented beautifully by using elegant tablecloths, garnishes and fancy platters. We must know who is coming to the party however, because certain crowds do not like buffets," Berk says.

Those who prefer to hold their party at home can leave a lot of details to their caterer. Elmaleh says that he holds a meeting at the place where the party is going to be held, in order to check out the layout.

"We have to know how many tables can be accommodated, how big a tent to order, if necessary — all the logistics of holding a party at home. We can also take care of all the details, such as serving staff, tables and chairs, linens, cutlery and decorations, so that hosts need merely to be there and enjoy."

Tri-Elm cooks prepare most of the food for private parties in its main kitchen and then warm it up in portable ovens and do not have to use the host's kitchen.

Lighter fare is definitely the buzz word these days and in response to clients' requests, Zuchter Berk has introduced a lighter Mediterranean menu that includes salmon, butternut squash and apple soup with thyme and different types of grain salads. "We also use a lot of chicken and less beef," he says.

One-stop shops have it all for you under one roof

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Busy parents need not fret if they don't have time to plan or run a party. They can just call one of many one-stop shops available in the city.

Loots (416-787-5668) at 1 Old Park Rd. in the Bathurst-Eglinton area is a tiny, 400-square-foot shop decorated with murals of the rain forest. With its wall-to-wall toys, candy and party accessories, it offers complete party services including theme decorating, paper products, balloons, themed cakes and loot with free delivery.

It's a party haven, with children of all ages visiting the shop from as far away as Hamilton and Mississauga, says store owner David Leese.

Loots also does bar/bat mitzvah theme party planning and decorating, which could include centrepieces, balloons, sign-in boards, smash cakes (cakes that break into pieces of chocolate), DJ prizes and give-aways.

"All this creativity is affordable," says Leese. "Most people have a budget and Loots finds ways to do things affordably."

Loots has also just expanded its birthday party services. It sends crews to hold theme birthday parties for children at their homes, he says.

"We can do arts and crafts, read stories, bring the loot and the cake. Such party packages start at $125 and include the ultimate service — clean up.

Loots has a catalogue and offers a toll-free service, so that customers across Canada can order from the wide selection of loot and novelty candy. Delivery for party-sized orders is free.

Loots is known for its ready-made loot packages, unique toys and novelty treats, but people can also "custom build" their own bags, Leese says. "Our concept is unusual. We sell pre-packaged age-appropriate themed loot bags priced from $4.99 to $5.49."

Some of the items Loots carries includes craft packages for older girls, such as decoupage and origami, with science kits and light-up yo-yos for older boys. A typical $5.49 package for a 5-year-old would include a butterfly net, pond-scum foam-in your-mouth candy and a spider squirt gun.

Sliding eye-ball pens, puppies in a pocket, jumbo jaw breakers, candy lipstick and hot dog gum are other popular items given out as prizes or bought by local kids with their own money, Leese says.

"It's the ultimate compliment when kids choose to spend their birthday money or Chanukah gelt in this store."

Bev Bergman, owner of Bags of Fun (416-665-2355) at 61 Russfax Dr. in the Steeles and Bathurst area, designs and manufactures arts and crafts (A&C) kits like fridge magnets to create, mask decorating and jewelry making, which she incorporates into loot bags.

"The fun continues after the party is over," Bergman says.

She was creating A&C kits before she branched out into the party business. People saw the kits and ordered them in bulk for loot bags, she explains. She left a sample kit at the Mad Hatter's Tea Party, a party centre in Markham, and now she sells them 400 bags a month.

Bagz of Fun is one of many one-stop shops

Party favors are affordable

Bags of Fun craft kits for $3.99 can be found at the Art Gallery of Ontario gift shop, hospital gift shops and the Mad Hatters Tea Party.

Bergman also creates specially wrapped gifts for favors and DJ prizes at bar and bat mitzvahs and hotel welcome bags for out-of-town guests.

Favors start at $5, she says. "I'm really mindful of today's economy. People are on a limited budget. I try to provide unique items people can afford." She also ties in the theme of the simchah with the hotel welcome bags.

Kosher and Natural (789-7173) at 3413 Bathurst St. offers a variety of party services, which include planning and decor, the rental of specialty machines like popcorn and candy floss makers, centrepieces, sign-in boards, candy-filled mugs, novelties, balloons, party supplies, candy sweet tables and candy centre-pieces.

"We'll take care of everything," says Jack Schnoll, owner of Kosher and Natural. "We've got connections everywhere."

His prices are reasonable, service is friendly, and he can deliver, set up and decorate for any event, he adds.

The shop is stocked with all kinds of bulk food candies. Mugs filled with candy and wrapped in cellophane are popular prizes and novelty items, he explains.

Candy is becoming popular for centre-pieces and one of the most colorful party items — usually for bar or bat mitzvahs is a candy sweet table filled with colorful candles like jellybeans, mickey mouse lollipops and taffy apples.

"The kids love it and the adults get to be kids again," Schnoll says.

Kosher and Natural also supplies smash cakes, the latest trend following a bar/bat mitzvah candle lighting ceremony.

The cake comes with a hammer, which the bar/bat mitzvah child uses to smash it into edible chunks. Everybody gets a piece of the chocolate. "The kids love it," Schnoll says.

Kosher and Natural fun-food machines, which include snowy cones, mini-donuts and soft pretzels are rented out with operators. These machines are extremely popular he says. "We're solidly booked until 1997."

Decorate with fun and flair – use balloons

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Five years ago Elvy Cohen, co-owner of Balloon Bash, started a home-based business, using her graphics skills to make centre-pieces. She then expanded and began decorating halls, and took courses and seminars in balloon decorating and sculpting.

Cohen moved Balloon Bash (905-707-8177) to a small office, but soon outgrew that space. Six months ago, she and her husband Sam opened a retail store in the Towns Gate Plaza at 7077 Bathurst St. just north of Steeles Avenue.

Balloon Bash now sells party supplies, customized gift baskets and centre-pieces, and she's busier than ever, she says.

Balloon Bash decorates for theme parties.

Her party decorations for theme parties and simchahs usually include elaborate balloon decor, she says. Balloon sculptures of brides and grooms, clowns and storks are very popular, as are the balloon monograms, arches, Stars of David, trees and menorahs. She also does fabric draping behind the head table, using balloons to give a creative touch.
